Sir, when a man sees himself about to be stripped of the means to support his family, and to be driven abroad like a leaf before the wind, the ties of nature prompt him to contrive some way to shield them from suffering. He has sworn before the holy altar to protect them in sickness, or in health, in prosperity or adversity, and he feels this bond to be more binding than the bonds of his creditors. Under these impulses, he is apt to seek some dark corner for the concealment of a portion of his goods. His faith is too feeble to trust the raven to give his children bread, or the hand that clothes the lillies of the valley to give them raiment. He feels that he has been ordained of heaven, to discharge these duties. Affection subdues principle, and sets the penalties of the law, and the reproaches of conscience at defiance, rather than to expose his family to the cold charities of the world without a shelter from the storm. Mr. President, we have the power to save men from this sad alternative. We have the power to place them above the temptation of committing fraud, to shelter their families from the tempest and the storm. Shall we do it? Sir, I fervently hope we shall.

I hope we may provide for him the means to secure a peaceful and permanent abode, without resorting to fraud. I have no doubt but there will be a diversity of opinion in regard to the amount of exemption.

For one, I desire only an amount that will secure a very humble home. I would not tempt the debtor to defraud his creditor. I think the sum which the amendment provides for is a reasonable one, and ought to be adopted. To those who own no lands, this bill secures to them their mechanic tools and implements of husbandry. These, with industry and prudence, will enable them to procure an interest in the soil, whereon to make a home. If they fail to do so, the fault is their own—the State has done its duty.

Sir, the laborer's home would operate as a fulcrum, on which a lever is placed to raise ponderous weights. No reasonable weight of debt would crush a laborer who had a home to refresh himself in. He would not be a floating debtor, but his creditor would know where to find him, and would be met at the threshold with a manly independence, ready to discharge his obligations from the never-failing capital of labor. Sir, you cannot bankrupt this capital. It is a sure, productive and safe foundation, on which the creditor may rely for the redemption of his notes. When this capital fails, Mr. President, all human operations will fail with it, for all are based upon it.

This measure, sir, cannot impair individual credit. In our fair and fruitful State, our resources are so abundant, our soil so fertile, our minerals so inexhaustible, our water power so magnificent, our industry and enterprise so proverbial—that not even our appraisement laws, which almost interdict the collection of debts, have prostrated individual credit. Look abroad, sir, at our railroads, the pride of our State, and see the vast loans, based upon them—see the rich merchandise spread forth in every city, town, and village in the country, and the liberal credits given to merchants, and then say whether individual credit is prostrated.

No, sir; and if credit has been sustained under those laws, an indefeasible inheritance in the soil will not impair credit; but it will lay a sure foundation for the safety of the creditor, and the prosperity and happiness of the debtor.

To honest industry, labor is no burthen; and when the laborer is cheered by the smiles of his family, and the assurance that his fireside is his own, he goes forth in the morning with cheerfulness, and returns at evening with a grateful heart. His children may be scattered here and there, through the city or the neighborhood, in busy industry during the week; but the tranquil close of it brings them again together, where they are refreshed from the deep fountain of fraternal love. In the language of Burns—"Hope springs exulting on triumphant wings;" and from the repose of the Sabbath, and the salutary lessons to which they listen, setting forth the rewards of virtue and the penalties of vice, they would go forth with renewed energies to their weekly labor.

Sir, men would be impelled to seek this comfortable independence from virtuous and honorable motives. They are about to take their stand with the respectable yeomanry of the country, and their homes are to be held too sacred for the touch of the law. Would they pollute them with fraud? Would they have the beams of their houses reproach them continually with fraud? Would they tempt the unseen hand to write upon the wall that ominous sentence, "thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." No, sir. Evil designs would stand abashed, and virtuous emotions would triumph—man would seek this earned pavilion through the path of industry, honesty, and integrity of purpose. What parent, whose circumstances bring him within the pale of the poor, who would not hail this measure as the precursor to happier days. A measure that would leave a hearth and a home to those he loves, when his hands should cease to labor. A measure that would not entail pauperism on society, or degradation on his name.

Who, in possession of such an abode, would not rest easier on a bed of death? To secure such a place of repose from the eddying storms of life, men need not the base incentive of dishonesty. Upright and virtuous impulses would awaken all their energies to obtain it. Every person, whether in prosperity or adversity, in view of the uncertainties of life, and the fickleness of fortune, would be induced to seek this asylum by such means as would leave no stain upon their name. And, sir, he would shape its value to the provision of the law which secures it. He would take good care that the sheriff could not divide it. A universal effort would be made to embrace the offered privilege, and in this would consist one of its best effects; for, in proportion as we interest citizens in the soil, we strengthen the government, and diffuse prosperity and equality. Sir, to have this great object of domestic comfort, men would rise earlier, work later, and eat the bread of carefulness. Conjugal exertions would be united, and the bright needle and the humming wheel would be plied with greater alacrity, in view of such a reward.

Sir, is it not worthy of Indiana—is it not worthy of this Convention, to give such an impetus to industry—such encouragement to morality? It is a maxim, that idleness and vice herd together, and that industry and honesty are apt companions. Pass this measure, and these twin sisters, like ministering angels, will walk through the land, dispensing honor to the State and comfort to her people. All eminent authors on political economy argue that an interest in the soil insures the devotion of the citizen to his government, and diffuses the greatest sum of prosperity.

A man having a home to defend, could scarcely be found recreant to his duty. All that is dear to the heart, would urge him to fly to his country's rescue in an hour of peril. In such a day, he would listen to that still, small voice, that inspires patriotism, and scorns danger—no Swiss emissaries would be found in their ranks. Every citizen would be a soldier, and every soldier brave. This measure, then, will not only strengthen the government, and give dignity and comfort to her citizens, but it will insure industry, abate poverty and pauperism, and redeem vast multitudes from want and wretchedness.

In every point of view, it seems to me, it recommends itself to the most favorable consideration of this Convention. Wisdom, humanity, the honor and interest of the State, plead for it. The earth is our common mother—may we not all have a place on her bosom? Finally, Mr. President, in this lovely land of ours, where the air is made vocal with the sound of independence, is it not pitiable, indeed, that the laborer, from whom we receive the bread we eat, or the raiment we put on—is it not pitiable, indeed, that this man should be denied a spot of earth, whereon to stand and assert his independence, and, having asserted it, maintain it against all invasion.

Mr. READ of Clark. My friend over the way (Mr. Murray) has made a pretty speech upon the subject. And, although it is truly a most important subject, I trust there will be not much more time consumed upon it. I admit that there is a very respectable minority in the State which appears to be in favor of something of this kind. I am satisfied of this fact, from what I have observed in the State Legislature for the last eight or ten years, where this subject has been occasionally introduced, and only a small minority voting for it.

This being the case, I would ask, if we might not endanger the acceptance of the Constitution by incorporating such a clause. It is my advice, therefore, to leave the subject with the Legislature, till the time shall come, when the whole people may see the necessity of a proposition of this kind.

Before I sit down, I would like to move to lay the amendment upon the table, but seeing other gentlemen desirous of speaking, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton said, he had no objection to laying the matter on the table if it would be called up again at the proper time. The Legislature of last winter would have passed a Homestead Exemption law, in obedience to the will of the people, but in view of the approaching session of this Convention, it was deferred.

Mr. BLYTHE. I take this occasion to explain the position I occupy on this question. I am in favor of the article just as it passed the committee and was reported. I am in favor of a liberal exemption of property from execution. But that is, in my humble opinion, the legitimate work of the Legislature, and there I would leave it.

If we adopt the amendment proposed as a Constitutional provision, we trespass upon the province of the Legislature. If it be true that a majority of the people are in favor of such a law, the Legislature will, undoubtedly, frame it. I believe that the principle of Homestead Exemption is demanded alike on the score of policy, and because it is consonant and in harmony with the spirit of the age. Examine the legislation of the country for years past and you will find that the spirit of exemption runs through all its acts.

But, sir, while I decidedly favor the principle, I cannot vote to place it in the Constitution, in detail, for I believe it would be out of place there. But I am willing, in this Constitution, to recognize the principle. This is just what the section as reported by the committee does.

I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment, and in favor of the report of the committee.

Mr. MATHER proposed to make the section the special order for Monday next.

Mr. COLFAX said he desired to express his views upon this important subject, but he would, if it were the pleasure of the Convention to adjourn, defer them until to-morrow.

And then, on motion by Mr. COLFAX, The Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, Nov. 23, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MILLS.

COL. RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. President, I desire, for peculiar reasons, which I will state to the Convention, to withdraw the preamble and resolutions which I offered yesterday, in regard to the death of the late Hon. Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, and that the same be stricken from the Secretary's Journal. I do this at the instance of a number of friends, in order that I may surrender the mournful office of announcing the death of a distinguished citizen, into the hands of another member of this body. I refer to my friend, one of the delegates from the county of Floyd, Major Thornton, who served as Captain under Colonel Johnson, in the north-western campaign. I do this, not on account of any aversion to the performance of that duty myself, but because it has been thought by several gentlemen around me that it more properly belonged to the gentleman who had served in the same campaign with that distinguished chief, and because I think myself, it would be more appropriate for the customary resolutions to be offered by him.

And accordingly, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Mr. Rariden have leave to withdraw his preamble and resolutions.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I now give notice that, on to-morrow, or some subsequent day of the session, I will move to amend the standing rules of this Convention as follows:

"No delegate shall speak longer than one hour at a time; nor in any debate arising upon the third reading of an article or section, or upon a motion to refer at that stage, more than fifteen minutes."

ABOLISHING PENALTY FOR DELINQUENT TAXES.

Mr. DICK offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on finance and taxation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending our Constitution, as to abolish the penalty of fifty per cent. on property sold for delinquent taxes; also, to extend the term of redemption of said estate, and to provide that personal estate be first sold.

The resolution having been read by the Secretary,

Mr. DICK said: Mr. President—on Saturday, fourteen days ago, I offered this same resolution, which was then not adopted. As it was presented in the mildest form, a mere resolution of inquiry, I had not anticipated any opposition; I therefore made no remarks upon its introduction, expecting as a matter of courtesy that it would be permitted to go to the committee. In this, however, I was disappointed. I shall therefore now avail myself of my privilege upon this floor to offer some reasons why it occurred to me that such a resolution was neither out of place, unimportant, or unworthy of the deliberative and serious consideration of this Convention.

Mr. President, if gentlemen will turn to the Auditor's report of last December, they will find the delinquent tax list of this State presents the enormous amount of $223,500 of deficiency. The penalty of 50 per cent. upon which is nearly $112,000. Now, sir, I would ask gentlemen, out of whose pockets this $112,000 comes?—no one will deny that it comes out of the scanty means of the poor man; nor will any one refuse to admit that it goes into the pockets of those of the rich, who are mean enough to seize upon every opportunity to crush still further that unfortunate class of our citizens.

Sir, if we divide the delinquent by the ninety counties, we have to each county a deficit of about twenty-five hundred dollars; the penalty on that amount is twelve hundred and fifty dollars. Now, sir, in my judgment, this is not so light a matter as to make it unworthy the attention of this body. The loss to the embarrassed portion of our citizens throughout the State annually, by this fraudulent penalty alone, must be at least sixty thousand dollars, a sum nearly equal to the annual expenses of our General Assembly. Public sentiment has determined, for reasons of economy, to save this expenditure every alternate year by adopting biennial sessions. Then why not try to find a remedy for an evil of equal magnitude, that falls exclusively upon the poor. Government must be sustained, and for that purpose taxes must be paid. But surely a more equitable mode of collecting them can be devised by the wisdom of this body than the present most wretched system. Sir, my constituents sent me here to obtain, if possible, relief from such palpable grievances, and if I should stand alone upon this floor, their support and the knowledge that I am right, will sustain me. I shall, therefore, if any objections are made to this resolution, demand the yeas and nays, and we shall then see how many friends the proposition has in this Convention.

The resolution was agreed to by consent.

ABOLITION OF THE COMMON LAW.

The PRESIDENT. This being the day set apart for the consideration of resolutions, the first resolution lying over upon the calendar is that offered by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Tague,) proposing to abolish the common law of England. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. I propose to amend the resolution by striking out the word "of" and inserting the word "in," so that it will read "in England."

SEVERAL VOICES. Read as proposed to be amended.

The resolution was accordingly read by the Secretary, as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Clark.

OTHER VOICES. "Consent," "consent." "Yeas and nays." "Tague, Tague, Tague."

Mr. TAGUE, addressing the President, expressed his desire to state the objects he had in view in offering this resolution; and remarking that he apprehended he could not be distinctly heard from his desk.

Upon the invitation of several members, he took his position in the aisle to the left of the Speaker's chair, and said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: This matter was somewhat discussed in the county where I live, and the people there desire the change contemplated in the resolution which I have offered. Some gentlemen may perhaps think that I have offered this resolution in the way of a jest, but I am in serious earnest. It has been said, not only in the county where I live, but wherever I have traveled and talked over the matter with the people, that we have had entirely too much law, and I have heard the same sentiment repeated in this Hall. As for my part, if we are to have a reform in the law which has been talked of, I have thought that the common law of England, of which it is complained we have too much, should be entirely abolished, and the practice of it taken out of the courts; for I am of the opinion—not that I am much of a law-maker, or that I understand much about law—that we have men in Indiana capable of making laws to govern ourselves, without referring to the common law of England, which has been made up from the decisions of judges who lived from five to eight hundred years ago; and those decisions were generally given in favor of those who held the appointing power—the great men, the king, and the lords.

I know, sir, that it may be argued here, that the common law is nothing more or less than common good sense; and I admit that a great deal of it is good sense; but I also think that the people of Indiana have good common sense enough to make laws for their own government. But it is to the practice of the common law that I principally object. I think that must be radically wrong, for I discover that a case can hardly ever be brought up and adjudicated upon its real merits. I would like to see such a reform instituted in our law practice, that a man can bring up his case in a brief and plain manner, and have it tried upon its merits. I object, also, to the right which is assumed, under the common law, by all the attorneys, to stop a witness, upon the stand, perhaps a dozen times, before he gets through with his testimony, and so preventing him from giving to his testimony the sense which it ought to have. It does appear to me that when a witness is called to give testimony, that he should be allowed to tell the matter in his own way, without being interrupted, and then he would be more likely to tell the plain truth; and let all the cross-questioning be done after he gets through. This would save a very great waste of time which is now indulged in all the courts.

I would remark that our circuit courts have become very expensive, on account of the manner in which cases are tried—which, also, is the result of having too much law; and I think, in all probability, that if the common law of England was done away with, and our laws made shorter and plainer, one-half the time which is now occupied by the courts throughout the State, and one-half of the present expense in money, would be sufficient for our people to settle all their difficulties. I do not wish to find fault with the attorneys, but when we go to them for advice, there is always too much of it. A common man cannot understand the law. It requires a long course of reading, for which he has no time, and I doubt very much whether a man of plain sense would be able to understand it all if he were to read it. But the attorney always tells him that he has a good case; and not knowing any better, he is led into law, which consumes time and becomes expensive, as before said. Our county I suppose to be about an average county, and the total expenses of the Circuit Court there for one year amounts to something like one thousand dollars; then the people of the one hundred counties of the State must pay a tax of something like one hundred thousand dollars a year to support the Circuit Courts alone. And if this expenditure of time and money could be reduced one-half it would make an item of saving to the people which would well deserve the attention of this body. The time alone which might be saved to the people in this way, is a matter of the highest consideration; for if three hundred men are more or less interrupted in their business by attendance upon the court in any of the average counties, (which I believe is a moderate estimate,) then thirty thousand citizens are more or less losers in this way, on account of the expensive and dilatory practice of the courts. Time is always worth money, and every day that might be saved in this way, would enable our citizens to accumulate more money at home.

For these reasons I would like very much to see something proposed and adopted into the Constitution which would make the State the gainer, in some such manner as I have pointed out. I hope the lawyers in this body will take hold of the matter and carry it out, and to give an opportunity for them to do so, I will surrender the floor.

Mr. NAVE. In order to give the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Tague) time to read and understand what the common law is, I move to lay the resolution and pending amendments upon the table.

This motion was lost, and the question recurred upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. Gibson.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton. Perhaps it would be better to make the consideration of this resolution a special order, and consider it in committee of the whole, so long as we are attempting to abolish the common law of England, for the sake of preserving amicable relations between the two countries; in the mean time, perhaps, it would be better that the matter of our proceedings should not appear upon the Journal. I move, therefore, that the Convention do now resolve itself into a committee of the whole upon this subject.

This motion was agreed to; and accordingly the Convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole, (Mr. Miller of Fulton having been called to the Chair,) and took up the consideration of the resolution and pending amendments.

Mr. MILLER (remaining in his place) desired to be excused from serving as Chairman.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson (addressing the Secretary, the President having vacated the Chair). I desire that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to enforce the order of the Chair.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope that as a matter of courtesy, the Chair will be given to the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Tague).

A VOICE. "Courtesy gives the Chair to the gentleman from Fulton (Mr. Miller)."

Mr. HALL. Would it be in order to reconsider the vote just taken?

A VOICE. "You voted against going into committee." [Much merriment prevailing.]

Mr. MILLER of Fulton (advancing to the Speaker's Chair) said, I ask the committee to excuse me from serving as Chairman at this time. Those who are in favor of granting me this request will please to say "aye."

MANY VOICES responded a most tremendous "no," from every part of the Hall, with shouts of merriment and laughter.

Order being partially restored—

Mr. ANTHONY said—

MR. CHAIRMAN, I propose to amend the amendment by adding to the end of the resolution these words: "And forever to abolish logic and the mathematics."

This amendment having been entertained by the Chairman, and the question being taken thereon, it was rejected.

Mr. COLFAX said—

MR. CHAIRMAN, I would suggest that lest the discussion of this resolution might disturb the amicable relations now happily existing between the government of this country and the government of Great Britain, it might be prudent for us to sit with closed doors. [Cries of "order," "order," and "sit down."]

Mr. MILROY. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following words: "And also Queen Victoria and the Fugitive Slave Law."

This amendment was agreed to, amidst cries of "division," and "Foster," "Foster."

Mr. WOLFE moved that the committee rise; but—

MANY VOICES responded another overwhelming "no."

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. CHAIRMAN,—— [Cries of "hear him," "hear him."]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Hancock has the floor. [Continued cries of "hear him," "hear him;" and "Foster," "Foster."]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. CHAIRMAN, I offer the following amendments to come in at the end of the resolution:

The amendment was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"And abolish the practice of manipulating." [Roars of laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN now attempted to put the question upon Mr. Wolfe's motion, but was effectually prevented by the uproar which was raised against it.

Mr. KILGORE. I desire also to propose an amendment whenever it shall be in order, by adding these words: "And the chills and fever."

The CHAIRMAN being completely overcome by the noise and confusion which prevailed in the Hall, retired from the Chair; and

The SECRETARY said, "Mr. Read of Clark will take the Chair."

Mr. READ obeyed, and advanced to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. [Knock, knock, knock.] The committee will come to order. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Clark, and which the Secretary will read.

The amendment having been read by the Secretary, it was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the committee now rise and report the resolution as amended to the Convention.

This motion was rejected.

Mr. HOVEY. I propose to amend the resolution by adding the following words:

"And that the Chairman inform Her British Majesty, by telegraph, that the common law in England is abolished."

This amendment was agreed to, amidst renewed shouts of merriment; and the question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. ANTHONY'S amendment was now again proposed, and it was agreed to, and the question again recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. MATHER proposed to amend by adding these words: "So as to make hickory bark peel the whole year round."

MANY VOICES. "Consent."

So this motion was taken by unanimous consent; and the resolution, as thus amended, was adopted by the Convention.

Mr. WOLFE. I move that the committee now rise and report the resolution as amended, to the committee.

This motion prevailing, the committee accordingly rose, and the Chairman reported that the committee of the whole, to which was referred the resolution to abolish the common law in England, with the pending amendment, had considered the subject, and directed him to report the same back to the Convention, with forty amendments, and to ask the Convention to concur therein.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the Convention concur?

Mr. PETTIT. I think we have carried this far enough, and as I do not want it upon the Journal, I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

This motion was agreed to, and the resolution lies upon the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PETTIT said—

MR. PRESIDENT: I ask the Convention to indulge me about three minutes with reference to the matter introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Maguire). That gentleman charged me with doing injustice to the memory of the late Governor Noble, by saying that the Governor had said that the whole system of internal improvements, adopted in 1836, could be completed without taxing the people anything to pay principal or interest. I do not know that I used language in just as broad terms as these; but I said yesterday if, upon examination of the Governor's messages, I should find that the allegation was not sustained by them, I would take it back and relieve his memory of an unjust imputation. I have no desire to do any man injustice, nor to pervert the truth. Truth is what I always seek for, and hope ultimately, if I have it not already, to attain to it. The gentleman said I had affirmed that this language was to be found in the last message of Governor Noble. I might have said so, but I am not aware that I affirmed anything more than that the Governor had asserted the principle in general terms, in one of his messages, that the whole expense of the public works could be sustained without taxation. The gentleman from Marion insists that I used the words as first above quoted. Other gentlemen tell me that I did not refer to "interest," but that I said that Governor Noble had stated that all these public works could be constructed without taxation. This, I think, is what I did say, and to show that I was not altogether wrong, I have brought here the message of Governor Noble, of December, 1835, and I find that it does sustain the allegation I made. After one season had passed, and Colonel Stansbury had made his surveys, he (the Governor) goes on to state how the parties had got along in the field; and urging the propriety of adopting his suggestions, he says:

"I will not, however, withhold the opinion that you may safely expend the amount of ten millions of dollars without calling on the present or future generations for the payment of any portion of the principal under the process of taxation."

Now, if I used the words "principal and interest," I certainly did Governor Noble injustice. But if I only said "principal," I did him no injustice. On the other hand, it was alleged that this message was written before the system was adopted, and therefore the Governor could not be held responsible for his fallacious argument. This is not fair. He ought to be responsible for the errors he induced the Legislature to commit.

I will not read further; but he goes on to suggest if every man in the State would pay in taxes half as much more as he then paid, that the sum which might thus be raised would complete all the public works. And since it was the utter falsity of the reasoning to which I adverted, I do not think that I did the memory of Governor Noble any injustice.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I noted down the language of the gentleman at the time, and if I got it correctly, it was precisely this remark:

"That Governor Noble, in his last message, declared that the people would never be taxed one cent for either principal or interest upon the amount borrowed for the purpose of completing the internal improvement system of 1836."

But, to be certain that I was not mistaken, I inquired of the gentleman in his seat.

Mr. PETTIT. The inquiry was, as to what message it was.

Mr. MAGUIRE. No, sir. I inquired also as to the statement as made by me on yesterday, and the gentleman replied in the affirmative.

It will be recollected, Mr. President, that on yesterday I stated that Governor Noble, in a message delivered before the passage of the act of 1836, declared the sentiment which the gentleman has just read from the message of 1835. The gentleman, however, should have read on a little further, and he would have shown the Convention that in the very next sentence is a recommendation that provision be made for the payment of the interest. Fairness and justice, it seems to me, demanded this at his hands. Immediately in connection with what the gentleman has read, is the following language:

"But to sustain an enterprise of such magnitude, a suitable provision should be made for the payment of the interest on the capital, one million of which would be needed the first year, and about an equal sum annually until the work shall be finished."

Mr. President, it is perfectly immaterial whether the allegation of the gentleman from Tippecanoe was that the principal and interest, or the whole cost, of the public works could be paid without costing the State one dime. I take it that they mean exactly the same thing. The explanation made by me yesterday was just as full as the gentleman's statement today. I admitted that Governor Noble, previous to the adoption of the system, gave it as his opinion that an investment of ten millions might be made in a system of public works without costing the State anything for the payment of the principal. But it cannot be shown that he did, in his last or any other message, assert, as was alleged by the gentleman, that those works could be constructed without taxation.

Mr. PETTIT. I stated in the fullest manner, that the Governor had not said anything about paying principal and interest.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I freely acquitted the gentleman in my remarks yesterday, of any intentional misrepresentation. But I must be pardoned for saying that his explanation would have been much more satisfactory if he had read the sentence to which I have called the attention of the Convention, and which fully exculpates Governor Noble from the imputation of the gentleman, whether that gentleman originally used the language imputed to him by me, or the language admitted by him to have been used.

STATE DEBTS.

Mr. BORDEN moved a re-consideration of the vote of yesterday by which the second section of the report from the committee on the State debt and public works was ordered to be engrossed.

The yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered upon this question,

Mr. B. said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have made this motion to re-consider for the purpose of enabling us to consider the matter of the preceding section, before proceeding to act upon the matter of the pending section. It is necessary to look to the preceding section in order to understand precisely the force and effect of adopting the section under consideration. If we proceed to the final passage of the section now under consideration, we close the matter and lock the door with reference to the privileges and restrictions to be conferred upon the section already adopted. We have to look to the preceding section for the purpose of understanding how far the powers of the State government will extend under this section. The language of the preceding section is: "The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt; but such debts shall not, at any time, exceed the amount of such deficits, Provided," &c.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). That section has been amended.

Mr. BORDEN. Not in that respect. But now according to the terms of that section, we can only borrow money to meet casual deficits in the revenue for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt, and for that purpose only. So long as the interest on the State debt is paid we cannot borrow one dollar in money, [a voice, "we dont want it,"] for any purpose whatever. The Legislature may be in session here, and on the morrow this Capitol might be burnt down; and in such an event you cannot borrow one dollar of money for the purpose of rebuilding it. If a blight were to go over the crops of the country, or the people become unable to raise the revenue from any cause, we would be unable to borrow, sir, even to pay the ordinary expenses of the State. We cannot tell what would be the result of this restriction. We cannot say what contingencies may arise in the future which would render the borrowing of a few thousand dollars absolutely indispensable. Now the amendment adopted upon the motion of the gentlemen from Lawrence (Mr. Helmer) creates an ambiguity in the sense of the section, where the meaning was more definite and certain before. As the section now stands, with this amendment, all the State government has to do, is to use the revenue for the payment of the interest on the debt, and thereby creating a deficit, which will enable the Legislature to borrow money to supply such deficiency—thus allowing those who administer the affairs of State to do that by an indirection which the spirit of the Constitution would forbid. If we look at the Constitution of New York, we find that it permits the Legislature to borrow one million for general purposes, without any restrictions whatever. I know that some gentlemen are opposed to referring to the Constitutions of other States as precedents. But if we look into the Constitution of New York or California, (which are both considered, I believe, to be very restrictive on this subject,) and observe how far they have gone, they will serve as guides to us. With the permission of the Convention I will read the tenth section of the seventh article of the New York Constitution:

"The State may, to meet casual deficits or failures in revenues, or for expenses not provided for, contract debts; but such debts, direct or contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not, at any time, exceed one million of dollars; and the monies arising from the loans creating such debts, shall be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained, or to repay the debt contracted, and to no other purpose whatever."

Here, as you observe, the Legislature is authorized to borrow money to the amount of one million of dollars without taking a vote of the people. That is giving great latitude compared with what I propose. But we, here in the section, prescribe that never, under any circumstances, shall the Legislature have power to borrow money beyond what may be necessary to meet deficiencies to pay the interest on the State debt. No State has ever yet gone so far in the way of restrictions upon this subject. I can use no better term than to say, by so doing, you manacle the State. You take away the power to borrow money, when it is impossible to see what contingency may arise in the future history of the State, requiring the immediate use of money.

I hope, therefore, that the Convention will re-consider the vote upon the engrossment of both sections of the report, and insert a clause permitting the Legislature to borrow one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars for general purposes. I submit it to the judgment and reflection of this body whether this section should not be so altered.

I called the attention to this subject on yesterday, and proposed an amendment to the first section. In that amendment it was provided that, to meet any temporary exigency, the General Assembly might borrow a sum not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, without a vote of the people.

Should the motion, which I now make, prevail, I propose to amend it so as to authorize the Legislature, with the approbation of the people, to borrow a sum not exceeding one million of dollars. Now, sir, it does seem to me that occasions may arise when the people should have the power to do this. I wish it distinctly understood that I am opposed to the people's borrowing money to go into banking, construct canals, railroads, or other internal improvements, and think it is not the legitimate objects for which governments are instituted. But, sir, the time might come when the people of this State would be willing to give their aid and assistance to the government in carrying on a war with a powerful foe. Sir, we all remember what the great State of New York did, under the influence of the patriotic Tompkins. She nobly aided with her credit, the Union in carrying on the late war with Great Britain. And, sir, shall we say that Indiana shall place it beyond her power to render the like assistance, should it become necessary? I trust not. I voted on yesterday against the amendment of the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) for the reason that it did not provide that the law which imposed the tax on the people, for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt, should be irrevocable. This I deemed a very important matter, for unless this restriction is inserted, the Legislature, after borrowing the money, might repeal the law imposing the tax.

My proposition made the law irrevocable until the principle and interest of the debt should be paid.

Another objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Shelby, was this: It provided that the question of borrowing money should be submitted to the people, giving them only three months' consideration. This, as I think, would not give time enough for the matter to be fairly understood. In the amendment which I intend to propose, it is prescribed that six months' consideration should be given to the people before the question should be taken. I propose further, that, as in the Constitution of California, every such proposed law should be published in at least one newspaper in every county throughout the State, for three months next preceding the election at which the question was to be submitted to the people. And then I proposed that neither directly, solely, or in the aggregate, nor indirectly, should the State contract debts, which should never exceed, in all, one million of dollars; whereas, by the gentleman's proposition, there was no limit to the amount which the State could borrow. This, I think, is a very material difference. I have alluded to the provision in the New York Constitution, which provides that the Legislature shall not borrow over a million of dollars, without the consent of the people; but with the consent of the people they may borrow any amount. It is my proposition to limit the aggregate amount of indebtedness to a million—giving ample opportunity for consideration and decision on the part of the people. I proposed this amendment because I cannot but consider that this matter of the power to borrow money, should always belong to the sovereign power of every government, under proper restrictions; and because I am unwilling to whittle down the power of the State to that of a mere corporation.

These, in short, are my views, and for these reasons, and others, I hope the engrossment of both sections will be re-considered.

Mr. WATTS. I think we should not re-consider. But I suppose we can go on with debate upon the subject for two or three days longer. This is substantially the same matter which was brought up by the gentleman from Sullivan (Mr. Wolfe). I could hope that we might be permitted to get along with business, without bringing up some new modification of the same matter every day, upon the meeting of the Convention. If, when a question has been decided twice by yeas and nays, it is not sufficient, when can it be reasonably expected that we can get through with the requisite amendments of the Constitution? For myself, I have but very little choice between the section as proposed to be amended, and as it now stands. However, I believe, for the interest of the State of Indiana, the present shape of the action is as good as we can make it. I have no particular wish to rid the representatives of the people of any just responsibility. If they are sent up here by their constituents for the purpose of passing laws, and if they should pass a law such as they might believe to be for the advancement of the best interests of their constituents, and that it should turn out otherwise, let them bear the responsibility, and not think to throw off their responsibility, by merely proposing laws and requiring the people to pass them. I am not a lawyer, sir, but I have my doubts whether it would be constitutional to pass a law that may take effect upon a certain contingency which may or may not happen.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. I move to lay the motion to re-consider upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order.

Mr. DUNN. Then I demand the previous question.

But the Convention refused to sustain the call.

Mr. RITCHEY. I freely accord, sir, the best motives to the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden), who has made this motion to re-consider. But I doubt very much whether any question, which is to come before this Convention, will be debated more thoroughly than this question has been already. We have spent several days upon it; and, if the gentleman had been in his place, attending to the argument, I think he would not have made the motion. The reasons which the gentleman presented were all rehearsed yesterday by the gentleman (Mr. Hendricks), who sits behind me.

Mr. BORDEN (Interrupting). The instructions accompanying my motion to re-commit, on yesterday, were materially different from those proposed by the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks).

Mr. RITCHEY. I have not been able to perceive any material difference between these propositions, which have been frequently submitted to us, during this discussion; and, if our progress is to be hindered in this way, when shall we get through with the business of this Convention? How much longer time must gentlemen have to consider this subject?

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I presume that I am as much disinclined to consume unnecessarily the time of this Convention, as any other member, but I must beg leave to say a few words in reply to some remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith). That gentleman did me the honor, to speak of me in terms far more complimentary than I have an idea are deserved. I acknowledge that I partake of the infirmities of human nature, and that flattery is as agreeable to me as to other persons; and while the gentleman was showering his compliments upon me, I could not but congratulate myself that we have a stenographer here, and that all these fine sayings would be printed and scattered abroad throughout the State; and, more than all, that they would go into the big book and constitute a part of the history of the times. But, sir, while I was indulging in these agreeable reflections, I suddenly discovered that his compliments had a double edge, and that while the gentleman gave me great credit for intelligence and sagacity, that he attributed to me a motive unworthy of any member of this body. He intimated that my opposition to the section under consideration, instead of being founded, in part, as I have stated, upon a desire that the Convention should not inconsiderately deprive the State of the opportunity of availing herself of the rights retained by her in the charter of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company, was because my wise forecast satisfied me that the adoption of this section would effectually prevent the private stockholders in that Company from hereafter foisting that road upon the State in case the stock became unprofitable. [Mr. Smith of Ripley, interrupting, said: "surely I did not attribute any motive of that kind to the gentleman. I merely drew an argument from the gentleman's remarks."] I understood the gentleman differently; but no matter. All I have to say on this subject is, that if any fear of this kind is entertained, and the State is desirous of disposing of her interest in that Road, I presume she can find a purchaser. In my former remarks, I alluded to this subject as one worthy of the consideration of the Convention. I have discharged my duty, and if any gentleman suspects my motives for so doing, it cannot be helped.

Permit, me, before I take my seat, to refer to some other cases in which it might be important for the State to have the privilege of using her credit. Suppose your penitentiary should be burned down, or your State treasury should be robbed, or your treasurer should prove a defaulter, all of which are at least possible contingencies, how are we to get along if we cannot use the credit of the State? Mr. President, I have too much respect for the good sense and prudence of the people of Indiana to say that they cannot be trusted to determine under what circumstances it would be proper to borrow money, and therefore I cannot vote for a Constitutional provision which would place this great State of Indiana under the protection of the minor act.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the Convention to the matter which we had up yesterday, embraced in instructions upon a motion to re-commit.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon a re-consideration of the vote by which the section was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. KILGORE. I understood that. But I desire to direct attention to these instructions, for the purpose of showing the necessity of re-considering that vote. The great objection which gentlemen urge against leaving this section open, is, their apprehension that the State may again enter into some system of internal improvement.

If this vote were re-considered, I could then propose to amend the section so as to meet the objections of gentlemen from that quarter, by providing that no debt shall be contracted on behalf of the State for the construction of any canal, railroad, or any other work of internal improvement. I wish merely to leave the question open with reference to borrowing money. There are various interests which might be endangered without such an open clause. It has been said, on a former occasion, that people overlook their best interests in times of excitement. And that is true. I grant it most cordially, that there is great danger from that quarter.

But again: I find a great propriety in supporting a Bank, and I am disposed, if the Legislature should deem it necessary to make a loan for that purpose, to allow them to do so. There are three parties upon this question of Banking. There are those who go for the right of free Banking; those who would support a State Bank; and those who are of what is called the no-Bank party. Well, I desire to ask those gentlemen who are in favor of free Banking, what Banking system they would be disposed to favor, if the free Banking system were voted down? I would ask whether they would not be in favor of a State Bank?

A VOICE. "No."

Mr. KILGORE. One gentleman says "no." I ask, then, of the no-Bank party, if they are driven to the alternative of choosing between a State Bank and the free Banking policy, which would be their choice, if they were driven to the alternative of choosing between these?

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio (interrupting). I rise to a question of order. I believe the subject of Banking is not under consideration.

The PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir, it is not. But I am showing why this question should be left open, on account of these different interests. I have no doubt, from the vote given yesterday, that, in the event of the prohibition of free banking, we shall establish no Constitutional provision for banking at all. And when gentlemen are driven to choose between various projects, there will be some feeling, as a matter of course. And they would not like to be tied up and compelled to decide upon what they do not fully approve, or throw away the whole. I am willing then, that the vote should be reconsidered, and I hope it will be, so that the subject may be re-committed and a provision inserted which will guard against all the great danger which gentlemen are most earnestly disposed to avoid.

Mr. NILES. I have been occupied in the court below, during a considerable part of the discussion upon this section. And I must say that while I concur fully in the spirit of the two sections as amended, I am inclined to think that a slight verbal alteration or amendment ought still to be made in the section now immediately under consideration.

It seems that collateral questions have been largely introduced in the debate. Now, I have supported the section, without reference to the question of bank or no bank, free banks or a State Bank, simply—as I have contended before—because I believe the accumulation of a public debt to be inconsistent with the best interests of the State. But the government should have the power to borrow small sums to meet casual deficiencies in the revenue, and in case of sudden and unforeseen emergencies. In the event of the burning down of the State House, as suggested by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) or of the Penitentiary, as mentioned by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) and in numerous other possible contingencies, the absence of such a power, would be a misfortune. As the section now stands, I apprehend that we could not borrow money for any such purpose. It reads thus: "The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits and failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt," &c. This evidently limits loans to be made, to the single purpose of paying interest on the State debt. I would suggest the propriety of inserting after "revenue," in the third line, the word "and." By such an amendment the section could probably be made to meet the wants of the case. Perhaps such a change may be thought properly to come within the province of the committee of revision, arrangement, and phraseology. If so, and if the change is made by them, I am content. The section would authorize the contracting of debts, both for the purpose of meeting casual deficiencies in the revenue, and to pay interest on the State debt. Both of these are evidently right and proper.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I desire to make a single remark in answer to the gentlemen who have brought this subject up: the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) and my friend from Laporte, who has just taken his seat. I will not take up more than five minutes time.

Mr. President, these arguments of gentlemen are plausible enough. But let me make this remark: that nothing but a general power to borrow money, without restraint or restriction, will meet these contemplated difficulties—and why?

Let us see whether, under this restricted power, you can always be sure of the means to re-build the State House or the Penitentiary, in case of their destruction by fire. We suppose the case that the State has borrowed to her utmost limits; and that the State House or Penitentiary is burnt down, does not any one see that a limited power does not answer. It will not do at all. You must have a general power; for your limited power may be exhausted in a single year. This consideration, in my opinion, is not sufficient to induce us to travel over the ground of this discussion again, upon a motion to reconsider.

My learned friend on the right (Mr. Kilgore) looks upon this matter as forever closing the action of the Convention. He seems to think that, if we adopt this section, without putting in the word "bank," the State might be left without the money to carry a bank into operation. But there can be no doubt about the past that, although you may take away the power to borrow money, if we create a bank we must also create the power to carry it into effect.

Mr. HOVEY. I merely wish to say, that I think that the previous action upon this section, came off at a very unfortunate hour. The question of a bank, and the subject of internal improvement, have been so blended with the matter of the section, that I believe many have voted against it for these considerations alone. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will reconsider the vote upon the engrossment, and postpone the final action, until the question of banking, and internal improvement, shall have been disposed of; so that we may act upon the matter of this report dispassionately, and bestow upon it the consideration which its importance so justly deserves.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I had hoped that we had at last found bottom upon the subject matter of this section. I have listened with attention to the reasons why we should again open this question. Gentlemen seem not to be satisfied with urging and repeating those reasons which have already been considered and rejected by the Convention. The supposition has been made, that the State House or State Prison might be burnt down, and so make a necessity for having a contingent power to borrow money for the purpose of rebuilding. Now I ask gentlemen to answer me in all soberness, if such a power is necessary, even in the cases supposed? If such a calamity were to befall the State, in either of the cases supposed, what would be the natural action of the Government? Why contracts would, be made and the work let out, (if it were necessary, this power would be assumed,) by the officers of State, for the re-construction of the building, and it would not be possible to re-construct either one of those buildings in the course of a single year, and in the mean time, either by a regular or called session the Legislature would act in the case, and assess the tax which might be necessary to raise a special fund for the work before the time could possibly elapse in which such an edifice could be constructed. The taxes could be collected even faster than the work could progress. So falls to the ground the air built vision, which can have no other effect than to consume time. I cannot see why gentlemen will be continually harping upon this subject. We have already spent four days upon it, and as I think elaborated every thing which can be usefully presented. No new idea has been presented this morning, and I can see no reason why any member should desire to change his vote upon the engrossment of this section. For my part I am prepared and willing to vote against the motion to re-consider; and I will now move the previous question.

But the Convention refused a second.

Mr. NAVE. I have not yet said anything in the course of this discussion. The doctrine of internal improvements by the State has been argued at length, which, in my opinion, has nothing to do with the question before us. On yesterday, I voted with the majority to engross this section—upon the same question which is now moved to be re-considered by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden)—for the express purpose of making a motion to re-consider, myself. Seeing a disposition on the part of the Convention to pass it as it was, and being satisfied, that, on account of extraneous matter which had been connected with the subject, nothing that could be then said would have any influence to produce a different vote; therefore, I said nothing; and I design now to say but a very few words.

My opposition to this section is founded upon this fact: that it is impossible for this Convention to look into the future. We cannot foresee what contingencies may happen to the State of Indiana ten years hence. And it is for the purpose of reserving to the people the power to contract a debt, to meet those unforeseen contingencies which may, and most probably will happen, that I oppose this section as it now stands. The people of Indiana have settled these two questions with reference to the power of the State to borrow money: that is, that the State, through the Legislature, shall never again borrow money to prosecute any system of internal improvement. The people have determined upon this time and again. And a portion of the people, in all probability—judging from the votes of this Convention—have determined that they will never give the power to the Legislature to borrow money for banking purposes. These are the only two questions, in my opinion, which the people have determined in regard to this matter. But they have not called upon this Convention to tie up the hands of the Legislature, or their own hands, so that they shall never create a debt to meet any contingency which may happen in the unknown future. Pass this section, sir, as it now stands, and you tie up the hands of the people with reference to the purchase of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad and other works of improvement, and completely waive the right to buy out all these works, which has been heretofore reserved to the State in their several charters.

I will read this reservation clause in the charter of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company:

"SEC. 64. The State of Indiana, through the Legislature thereof, shall have the privilege, at any time after twenty years, to purchase from any such association the entire interest such association may have acquired under the provisions of this act, by refunding to such association the full amount actually expended thereon by such association, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum thereon, from the date of such expenditure, first deducting from said six per cent. all net amounts of revenue received by such association."

Will any gentleman say that it will never be, at any time in the future, to the interest of the State to purchase out the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad? And should we manacle the hands of the State so as to render such a thing impossible, simply because a portion of the people have been once beguiled into the adoption of a most ruinous system of internal improvements? Are we to have this old system held up before the Convention, for the purpose of governing our action.

Sir, I, for one, have ever been opposed to that system. I have ever been opposed to the principle of the State borrowing money to prosecute works of internal improvement. I have ever been opposed to the State going into any speculation of any kind. But I never can be in favor of tying up the hands of the State, in the terms proposed in this section. I think, therefore, the vote out to be re-considered.

Mr. OWEN. I rise for the purpose of making to the Convention, a single suggestion, and I hope it will meet the views of my friends, the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles). It is well known that this section, after it has passed the third reading, has to be referred to the committee on revision. And it will be well known to the committee, that the intention of the Convention, when they passed this second section of the article, was to provide that, in the event of any casual deficiency in the revenue, the State might be allowed to borrow a small amount.

Mr. BORDEN. [Interrupting.] Did not the Convention strike that out?

Mr. OWEN. No, sir. Here is the section as reported, (Mr. Read's). There is no "or" nor "and" in it. With reference to the alteration made by striking out "one hundred thousand dollars," and inserting "the amount of such deficits," I think it must be quite clear to every gentleman, that it was not the intention to prevent the Legislature from borrowing to any amount which might be necessary to meet any casual deficit in the revenue. And, if that be understood, certainly, I think the committee on revision will feel themselves authorized to make any verbal alteration, which would make the sense clear. I hope, therefore, that this correction will be left to that committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there is any question upon which I feel myself to be directly instructed, it is that now before the Convention. I hope the vote will not be re-considered. If we consider the language of this section for a moment, we shall find that it confers every power which ought to be demanded. In the first place, it confers upon the Legislature the power to borrow money for the purposes of meeting any deficit in the revenue, or in the amount necessary to pay the interest on the State debt. This, a fair majority of the Convention have been disposed to sustain, and they have sustained it by repeated votings.

But some very plausible arguments have been thrown out, in favor of giving further authority to contract a public debt.

Gentlemen have supposed what may or may not exist in the future. They have supposed that the State House might be destroyed, and asked what would be the situation of things if the State could not borrow money to re-build it. Why, there is a plain, simple, well decided, direct course to pursue, in such a case; a course presenting itself to my mind which would be acted upon cheerfully by the people of Indiana. Suppose such a contingency were to happen. A special tax for the purpose of re-building, imposed upon such men as my constituents, (I speak for them because I know them,) would be paid most cheerfully; and these men hold—and I believe with them—that the State should never go into any speculation which would involve the borrowing of money. Sir, the people of our State are not so penurious and contemptible as to refuse to pay a tax which their representatives might assess for building a State House. Sir, it is all poetry, this talk about burning down the State House, the Penitentiary, and other public buildings. It is no argument to me to say that the people cannot furnish the means to build a State House, without going into the market and borrowing money.

Gentlemen say, we do not see what will take place in the future. Aye, sir, and because we are not able to see what may take place in the future, that is a very strong reason why I wish to shut the door against abuses. True, we cannot see what influences may come up to seduce the people, but one thing we can see and appreciate, and that is, sir, that experience is the best teacher, though sometimes the very hardest of masters. But I know of no better rule in making up our judgments with reference to any particular course of policy than to look at the past. What has happened once may happen again. What has taken place in days gone by might take place again in time to come; and I venture to say, there is not a member upon this floor, nor a citizen of the State of Indiana, who would ever say that money should again be borrowed by the State and squandered as heretofore. I say, then, that if we authorize the Legislature to borrow money for the purposes mentioned in the section, we go as far as we ought to go. Yes, sir; in the emphatic language of the gentleman from —, (Mr. —),—perhaps my own modesty would not have prompted me to be the first to say it—the people have been swindled out of their money. There never was a greater swindling operation taken from first to last, than that which was enacted with our agents in connection with the Wall Street brokers.

It was said by the gentleman over the way (Mr. Nave) that the time might present itself when it would be for the interest of the State to purchase the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. That Road is very good stock—perhaps the best in the State; I maintain, however, that the time may come hereafter, and perhaps it is not very far distant, when that Road will be effectually tapped, and the profits of the Company turned in another direction. But be that as it may, I am willing, from this time forward, during the period of the continuance of the amended Constitution, to prevent the State from going into any such speculation.

I confess that since I made some remarks on yesterday with reference to this subject, I have been congratulated as a good democrat, and some of my whig friends have almost held out the hand to bid me adieu. I may be mistaken, but if, in advocating this measure, I am justly charged with being a democrat, although few democrats will keep company with me out of doors, at all events I will be with them upon this subject, in this Hall. But I know no particular party with reference to any measure to be considered here. I vote for what I believe to be right, because that is my duty, and my people have instructed me to do so. And it is for the purpose of protecting the rights of the people that I am in favor of shutting up the doors of public credit for the future.

If I could believe that anything of advantage to the State could come out of this re-consideration, and the continuance of this discussion, in the spirit of liberality which I always desire to maintain here, I would vote for it. But believing that the minds of members are firmly made up in favor of the section as it stands, I have only to say that I hope the vote will not be re-considered.

Mr. SHERROD said: I do not rise, sir, for the purpose of inflicting a speech upon the House. I have but little to say, and shall say that little quickly. I have been an attentive listener to the discussion of the question now under consideration, and with the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) I think the main point at issue has not been discussed; at least the greater portion of the argument, has been upon another branch of inquiry. Why, sir, in listening to the debates that have consumed the time of this House for the last three or four days, we are readily brought to the conclusion that the question is not, whether we will or will not have a State debt. But who of the honorable gentlemen upon this floor are most conversant with the countless topics of former ages and who have been the greatest advocate or opposer of the old exploded system of internal improvement. Why, sir, gentlemen have traveled around the universe, they have arrayed before us, ancient and modern history. They have resurrected that old monster, the system of internal improvement, that I had hoped was buried so deep that the hand of resurrection would never reach it, and paraded its ghost around this chamber for the last four or five days, until it now stands like the ghost of Banquo staring us in the face from every hole, and for what purpose I cannot see, unless it is as I have already mentioned. Now, Mr. President, I would ask in all seriousness what we are to gain by continuing a discursory debate that is entirely foreign to the main question. For one, sir, I am sick, and heartily sick of such a course. We have had a decisive expression of the Convention in favor of the section as engrossed. Then, sir, why continue to retard the action of the Convention by an effort to re-consider the vote, cast on yesterday.

So far as I am concerned I voted my sentiments and they are not to be changed, unless there is more forcible reasoning than I have yet heard.

Sir, I have discussed this proposition before the people whom I have the honor to represent here, and from all I have been able to gather, I venture to say that there will not be a single article or section in the amended Constitution, which will meet with a more hearty approval by the people, than the section as it now stands.

I had hoped, sir, as the call for the previous question was not sustained, that gentlemen on the opposite side of the question, would have given us some new light by which we would be enabled to see the errors that we have committed.

But, sir, in my mind there has not yet been offered one particle of reason why we should re-consider this vote.

Gentlemen talk loudly about tying up the hands of the people, and have denounced the friends of this measure as usurpers, as having trampled the fundamental principles of democracy under foot. Now, sir, I hope we will hear no more of this miserable cant about placing limitations and restrictions on the people. As

I have remarked on a former occasion, the very foundation of government rests upon restrictions and limitations upon the power of the people—a Constitution itself is a restriction upon the powers of the people.

My friend over the way (Mr. Wolfe) remarked on yesterday, that when the resolution which I had the honor of introducing into this body to restrict debate was under consideration, there was a great deal of kicking and flouncing against it, and this was echoed as an argument in favor of restricting debate.

I will now ask the gentleman from Sullivan, if he did not support that proposition to restrict debate, upon the principle that no deliberative body can well govern themselves without restrictions.

Now, sir, if it be true that this body cannot govern themselves—that they will run wild in the excitement and heat of debate without wholesome restrictions, is it not also most probable that the people themselves will become excited, and require the same wholesome restrictions. But perhaps I should not have alluded to my friend from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) for when the vote was taken, we find him right, voting for the engrossment of the section.

Now, Mr. President, I am decidedly opposed to re-consideration; I can see no good that can result from it, but only the consumption of time, and if the discussion were to be continued for weeks, I suppose there would be no change effected in the minds of the members of this body upon a question of this character; and it cannot be supposed, that the minds of the people, themselves, which have also been thoroughly made up, could be affected upon this subject by any amount of debate in this Hall.

MR. LOCKHART. MR. PRESIDENT: A strange fatality seems to await this section, or rather the section as it came from the committee, of which the honorable gentleman from Gibson is chairman. From its advent here up to the present time, a large number of those who opposed its adoption as reported, are those who ought have supported it.

It is well known to my colleagues upon this floor, that every candidate for a seat in this Convention from the counties of Posey and Vanderburg advocated the adoption of just such a section as the committee reported. Indeed, early in the session, a resolution was unanimously adopted by the Convention, requiring the committee to report the section; since then, however, a change seems to have come over the spirit of the dream of a majority of the members of this Convention. The section, as it now is, has been so amended that its original friends do not know it. I trust, sir, that the motion now pending will prevail. I wish to see the section brought back to its original form, or substantially so. Then it will come up to the just expectations of the people; then it will conform to the resolutions of the democratic convention which nominated Wright for Governor. One of those resolutions—and the one to which I particularly refer—was read on yesterday by the gentleman from Shelby, (Mr. Hendricks,) and was drafted, I am told, by one of my colleagues. Indeed, I understand him as admitting its paternity, in his note recently published in the "Statesman."

Mr. OWEN (interrupting) said, that his note only admitted that he drafted the resolutions on the slavery question.

Mr. LOCKHART. I understand the note as published in the "Statesman," to embrace them all; but I may be mistaken in this; but whether I am or not, is quite immaterial to the consideration of the question now before the Convention. I will, however, state for the information of my colleagues, that I have been informed that the manuscript resolutions have been seen within a few days past, and that they appear to have been written by the same hand.

This resolution, sir, among others, was inscribed upon the democratic banner under which Joseph A. Wright was borne into the Gubernatorial Chair. It was adopted as a part of the democratic creed two years ago. Its principles then received my sanction; they shall now receive my support. I cannot but express my surprise that my honorable colleague has taken the opposite side; for upon the stump we both advocated the principles embraced in the reported section. I recollect a remark which he made upon the stump. It was this: "Why, if the people vote a tax upon themselves, I ask, is it not their own business?" That was right. I should like to hear him advocate the same doctrine now. Mr. Matson, the competitor of Governor Wright, advocated the same provision; and so far as my information goes, every democrat and whig who went upon the stump throughout the State, advocated it. The people of the district which I represent expect to see such a provision engrafted into the Constitution. In conformity, therefore, to the public will, as expressed through the ballot box, I voted against striking out the provision in the section under consideration permitting the Legislature to borrow money on the credit of the State, when the people, who are our masters, shall say through the ballot box that it ought to be done. Has it come to this, sir, that the servants of the people are afraid to trust their masters? Do they expect or require at the hands of this Convention that the Legislature and they themselves should be tied down, and prohibited from exercising so important a branch of sovereignty as this? Certainly not. The section, I would remind the Convention, in its original form, is a sufficient guaranty that no State debt will ever be created unless some cause of urgent necessity shall hereafter require it; and ought we not to provide for such an emergency? It seems to me, sir, that wisdom requires it, and that it would be the height of folly to prevent it. The high-minded and honorable constituency which I represent agree with Mr. Jefferson in saying, that "OUR LIBERTIES CAN NEVER BE SAFE BUT IN THE HANDS OF THE PEOPLE THEMSELVES." The section, as now amended, I believe to be in violation of this great principle. By voting for it, I would prove recreant to my duty; I should disappoint the just expectations of my constituents. They sent me here for no such purpose. Matters entirely foreign to the subject under consideration have been dragged into this discussion; and for what? Can gentlemen tell why the old system of internal improvement and the bank question have been introduced? Was it for any laudable purpose? Was it not for the purpose of creating a prejudice in the minds of members against a correct principle—a principle which they themselves, and the people who sent them here, have expected to see placed in the amended Constitution; for certainly these subjects have nothing at all to do with the question we have been considering.

Some gentleman declared upon this floor, that, if the internal improvement system of 1836 had been submitted to the people, they would have ratified the act. But this I deny. It would not have received the vote of a respectable minority if it had been submitted to the people. I will speak now for the first Congressional district, and the Senate district which I represent. In those districts, the first vote which could be taken as anything like a test upon this question, was cast at the election of 1837, when John Dumont and the honorable gentleman who sits before me (Mr. Wallace) were candidates for Governor. In the first district, John Dumont received a majority of three thousand seven hundred and forty-four votes. In this district, the canal passed through the counties of Pike, Gibson, Warrick, and Vanderburg. In these four counties, Dumont beat Wallace twenty-nine votes. In the county of Orange, through which the New Albany and Vincennes McAdamized road passed, Wallace had a majority of one hundred and fourteen votes. The county of Posey gave Dumont one thousand and ninety-nine of a majority. From this statement, I think, it is clear that the Senatorial district composed of the counties of Posey and Vanderburg would have voted against the internal improvement system. I think it is equally clear that the first Congressional district would have voted, by a very large majority, against the system.

Wallace, it will be remembered, was to be the successor of Gov. Noble, the father of the internal improvement system. Dumont was the candidate of the classifiers. He became a candidate at a late period in the canvass, too late to canvass the State, but where he went he made his mark; it would have been a glorious day for Indiana had he succeeded, as he doubtless would have done had he thoroughly canvassed the State. I make these remarks, Mr. President, with no unkind feelings towards the gentleman from Marion, for I can assure him, and this Convention, that I entertain no other than the kindest feelings towards him; but having been a classifier myself, my predilections were all in favor of the success of Dumont. I saw at that period, sir, that our load was too heavy—that classification was the only thing that would secure us; the result has satisfied the most sceptical.

The right of one generation to create a debt for a future generation to pay, has been denied by my honorable colleague (Mr. Owen). I do not design to discuss this question at this time. I only desire to say that I do not subscribe to that doctrine; it is too erratic for me. I do not think the position can be sustained by reason or authority. Does not the incoming generation succeed to all of the improvements in the arts and sciences, and in the possession of property of the preceding generation? Why, sir, if it be true that one generation cannot create a debt that shall be obligatory upon a succeeding generation to pay, why is it that we toil to transmit wealth, literature, and learning, to those who are to succeed us? Why do we not, instead of transmitting our monies, goods, and chattles to those who are to succeed us, destroy all! Why do we not, at the time of our death, cause our houses, barns, and buildings to be burned to the ground? If they are not to pay debts that were contracted for the general prosperity of the country, why let them succeed to any of the wealth of preceding generations?

Mr. Jefferson with all his radicalism did not go so far; he said that in the funding of a public debt, the payment of it ought rightfully to be made within the lives of a majority of the generation contracting it; but Mr. Jefferson does not take so broad a ground as my honorable colleague, but, sir, the impracticability of determining when one generation enters upon the theatre of action and another leaves it, to my mind entirely refutes the position.

This, sir, is an important question; one which demands the attention of this body. I hope that it will receive that consideration which is due to so important a subject, and that free discussion will be tolerated.

I hope that the friends of both sides will be heard upon the proposition; and that there will be no more efforts to stifle debate.

I do not wish to be understood from what I have said, that I am in favor of creating a State debt. On the contrary, I am opposed to the creation of such a debt, except in cases of emergency, and then only to a limited extent. I am opposed to the State's embarking in any system of internal improvements, or becoming a stockholder in any banking institution, upon borrowed capital, unless with the consent of the people of the State. When it is said that this Convention is going too far, that we are imposing restrictions that the people do not desire, we are coolly told that if the people ratify this Constitution which we form, it is then their own act. This is a most magnanimous mode of argument, for the reason that there may be a great many good things in the Constitution, enough to overbalance the evil, so that the people would be induced to ratify it in the hopes of getting the evil removed by specific amendments hereafter. Hence this argument is without the slightest force; it is merely begging the question.

Some of the reasons advanced by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) appear to be conclusive in favor of re-consideration. Indeed, I cannot bring myself to believe that a majority of this Convention would have voted to mutilate and destroy the original section, had the internal improvement and bank questions been kept out of this debate.

I hope the motion to re-consider will prevail, and then that the further consideration of the subject will be postponed until after the discussion of the bank question. At that time I hope we shall have a full Convention; and if then, upon comparing notes, it shall be found that a majority of this body are in favor of the engrossment of the amended section, as they were on yesterday, then the friends of the original section will bow in humble submission to the will of the majority. Until then, we must oppose the passage of the section as engrossed—we must also oppose instructing the "smoothing iron" committee to change the section after it passes the Convention. Here, and here only, is the place to make amendments.

MR. OWEN. MR. PRESIDENT: All accounts between myself and my constituents, I shall settle in person, without troubling the Convention, and without any aid from the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Lockhart). When that gentleman returns home, he will, I imagine, find his hands full with his own business. He introduced, early in the session, a resolution, declaring that "the interests of the people and the honor of the State, demand" that all banks should be prohibited by the Constitution. Yet, neither I, myself, nor his constituents at home, have forgotten the long and labored arguments he made, during the canvass, in favor of a State Bank. All that is nothing to me, sir; nothing to the Convention. It is an affair solely between the gentleman and his constituents; to which I should never have adverted at all, except by way of reminding the gentleman that he had better give attention to his own affairs, instead of intermeddling in mine.

The gentleman speaks for the first Congressional district, declaring what are the views and opinions there entertained. My right to speak for that district, is, it strikes me, as good as his. And I say here, that, whenever this subject is agitated before that people; whenever they are called upon to decide whether the question of increasing our present public debt, shall or shall not be left open; if three-fourths of the voters of the district do not say, "Close the door at once!" then I will confess that I have canvassed that portion of the State to very little purpose.

A single word as to the resolutions passed at the democratic convention two years ago. I was not there; but my distinct impression is, that the resolutions on slavery only, were of my drafting, and they were considerably altered from the original draft. Be this as it may, it is immaterial. I admit to the gentleman, that if I had drafted the resolution relative to public debt, in all probability it would have been in substance, the same as that adopted. That was the usual form then received. Public opinion has been gradually maturing since, and settling down, more and more strongly, against all increase of debt. I believe it now demands an absolute prohibition. I believe it is right in the demand; and that consideration decides my vote.

Mr. LOCKHART. Mr. PRESIDENT: I crave the indulgence of the Convention for a few minutes, for the purpose of placing the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and myself right. My honorable colleague seems to think that I was interfering between him and his constituents, in the few remarks I made this morning. In this, sir, he is mistaken. His constituents, it will be remembered, are my constituents. I, therefore, had a legitimate right to refer to the manner in which the canvass, in my district, was conducted, and to state the views expressed by the several aspirants to a seat in this body, upon the question under debate. In stating that he advocated before the people the adoption of the section as reported by the committee, I stated a simple fact. To this statement he excepts. He has alluded to the anti-bank resolution, introduced by me, on the 24th of October, in no kind spirit. That resolution was introduced for the double purpose of showing the reverse of the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) and for the purpose of gaining strength to the State Bank party in this connection. It was not introduced because I expected to vote for it myself, but for the purpose of getting a vote upon the question of bank or no bank. This was known to several friends of the State Bank system, before I introduced it. It was introduced with their approbation. It was known to them and to me, that there were several members on this floor who were opposed to all banks, but who favored the State Bank, in preference to free banks.

It is well known to my colleague, (Mr. Owen,) that, during the canvass, I stated to my constituents that I regarded the bank question as settled. That the question in the Convention would be between a State Bank and branches, and free banks; and that I favored the State Bank system. That I had seen no system of free banks that I could approve; and that, while banks existed in neighboring States, I believed that sound policy required that we should have sound, solvent, specie-paying banks of our own; if not, that we would be flooded with bank paper from other States, the solvency of which the people could not know. That, under the State Bank system, we had got along very well;—its paper was good, and our people generally satisfied with it; and that, to break down the banking system in the State at present, would be productive of ruinous consequences to all interests, and that none would feel the evils more than the agricultural and laboring classes of our citizens.

Mr. BRACKEN objected—he rose to a question of privilege. It was a rule of the Convention that no gentleman should speak a second time upon the same subject, until all others had had an opportunity to speak. He had waited to see what courtesy leading members of the Convention would extend to those more modest gentlemen, who were disposed to stand back and "wait for their turn." But he was satisfied that courtesy from that quarter was a delusive fallacy, and he now insisted upon the rights of others to have an opportunity to express their views and give a reason for their votes.

Mr. READ of Clarke hoped the President would enforce the rule rigidly. His friend, Governor Wallace, had been desiring to address the Convention several days, but had had no opportunity.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is but a courtesy which the Convention is bound to extend to the gentleman from Vanderburg to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Posey. It is his clear and just right.

Mr. OWEN. I trust, Mr. President, that the gentleman from Vanderburg will be permitted to proceed.

The question, "Shall the gentleman be allowed to proceed?" was put by the President, and decided in the affirmative by the Convention.

Mr. LOCKHART. This is, I believe, sir, the second time that the honorable member over the way has called me to order. In both instances, however, I have been permitted to proceed, once by the decision of the presiding officer, and this time by the courtesy of the Convention, for which I now return my humble acknowledgments.

I was about proceeding, Mr. President, to say that my honorable friend need not give himself any uneasiness about my anti-bank resolution. It has filled its office, it has answered the end for which it was introduced.

In conclusion, permit me to say, that all my acts here shall conform to the will of my constituents—that I shall redeem every pledge I made them during the canvass.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I do not wish to make a speech, but I desire to refer to an authority upon the democracy or the anti-democracy involved in this question of a public debt. I wish to quote an extract from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, of about twenty lines only.

SEVERAL VOICES. "Read it."

MR. CHAPMAN. It is as follows:

"To preserve our independence, we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our selection between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude. If we run into such debts as that, we must be taxed in our meat and in our drink, in our necessities and our comforts, in our labors and our amusements, for our callings and our creeds, as the people of England are. Our people, like them, must come to labor sixteen hours in the twenty-four, give the earnings of fifteen of these to the government for their debts and daily expenses; and the sixteenth being insufficient to afford us bread, we must live, as they now do, on oatmeal and potatoes! have no time to think, no means of calling the mismanagers to account; but be glad to obtain subsistence by hiring ourselves to rivet their chains on the necks of our fellow-sufferers. Our land-holders, too, like theirs, retaining, indeed, the title and stewardship of estates called theirs, but held really in trust for the treasury, must wander, like theirs, in foreign countries, and be contented with penury, obscurity, exile, and the glory of the nation. This example reads to us the salutary lesson that private fortunes are destroyed by public, as well as by private extravagance. And this is the tendency of all human governments. A departure from principle in one instance, becomes a precedent for a second, that second for a third, and so on, till the bulk of society is reduced to be mere automations of misery, to have no sensibilities left but for sinning and suffering. Then begins, indeed, the bellum omnium in omnia, which some philosophers, observing to be so general in the world, have mistaken it for the natural, instead of the abusive state of man. And the forehorse of this frightful team is public debt. Taxation follows that, and in its train wretchedness and oppression."

I have only to add this remark, that the principle in opposition to a public debt was one that both Conventions endeavored to establish. The details were considered as of secondary importance.

MR. BORDEN. I merely wish to say a few words in personal explanation. I have been, in the main, a silent but an attentive observer of all the proceedings of this Convention. As I remarked at the opening of the session, I did not intend to occupy the floor much in debate, but would endeavor to perform my portion of the labor of the Convention. I was willing to assist to the extent of my power at the organization of the Convention, and in laying out business for the session, and after that to remain as far as I could consistently with the interests of my constituency, a silent member.

I have considered the arguments on both sides of this question, and have carefully examined the Constitutions of other States in relation to this matter, and I find no precedent for the restrictive policy to the extent which is so strongly advocated by gentlemen.

As to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and the committee on phraseology and arrangement, I know that in expressing my sentiments fearlessly against propositions to commit the whole matter thus pertaining to the new Constitution to the hands of one man, I may have done myself some personal injury; but, sir, my sense of duty will not allow me to shrink for mere personal considerations. And I shall continue to oppose assumption or the exercise, on the part of the committee of revision, of any power to change the principle of a section, which can very easily be done by slightly changing the position of words. That committee have only a right to change the language—not the spirit or meaning of the articles and sections referred to them.

Mr. President, although I know that it is not entirely proper to allude to the canvass preceding the election of Delegates, I desire to ask attention to some of the instructions passed by the people of my district. They are very short and I will read them.

The following principles among many others were recommended:

"The sacred preservation of the public faith by punctually paying the interest on our State Debt and the adoption of some plan for the gradual, but certain, redemption of our outstanding State Stocks so as to relieve the people from perpetual taxation.

And also a Constitutional barrier against improvident State indebtedness by requiring all laws creating loans before they are carried into effect, to be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection, except to a very limited amount in cases of immediate necessity."

By this some idea can be gained of the state of public opinion in the section of the State which I in part represent.

Mr. President, I moved a re-consideration, but in order to put myself right where my position might be misunderstood I will withdraw that motion and move to commit this section to the standing committee on the State Debt and Public Works, with the following instructions: to insert after the word "article," in the line, the words

"Unless such debt shall be authorized by a law for some single work or object therein distinctly specified, together with the amount; but such debt or debts, direct and contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not, at any time, exceed one million of dollars; and such law shall provide for the collection of a sufficient direct annual tax to pay the interest on such debt, as it may fall due, and also to discharge the principal within eighteen years from the contracting thereof; and the law levying such tax shall be irrevocable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and discharged.

And on the final passage of such bill, in either House of the Legislature, the question shall be taken by ayes and noes, and entered on the Journal thereof, and shall be, Shall this bill pass? and ought the same to receive the sanction of the voters of this State? And no such law shall take effect until it shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the voters, and have a majority of all the votes cast for or against it. No such law shall be submitted to be voted on within six months after its passage, nor until it shall be published in at least one newspaper in each county, if one be published therein, throughout the State, for three months next preceding the election at which it is submitted to the people;" and said law shall not be submitted at any general election where any other law shall be submitted to be voted for or against.

The money arising from any loan or stock, creating such debt or liability, shall be applied to the object specified in the act authorizing such debt or liability, or for the re-payment of such debt or liability, and for no other business whatever."

Mr. BASCOM remarked that he did not feel bound by the instructions just read. His people had declared positively against a State Debt.

After some conversational debate as to the points of order relative to Mr. Borden's motion,

Mr. BORDEN withdrew his motion to commit, and renewed his motion to re-consider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) was adopted.

Pending the question upon which motion, The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT resumed the chair at 2 o'clock, P. M.

Mr. PRATHER said:

Mr. President, I find about forty members absent from their places, and I therefore move to dispense with the further consideration of this subject till Thursday. It seems to me that the Convention should be full when the vote is to be taken upon a question of such importance, and I hope the order will be taken.

The motion was lost.

Mr. BRACKEN. Probably it is due to myself, under the circumstances, to make a few remarks. And first, I wish to say a few words to the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Lockhart,) though my course might seem to be personal, I intended nothing against the gentleman; but my object was to call the House to order. It was a mere accident that my call to order was directed against him, and not because I considered him to be out of order more than others. I do not wish to set myself up as a censor in this body, but, having rules to be governed by, I think it is important that we should observe them.

Mr. LOCKHART (interposing). I have no doubt the gentleman's call to order was made from the best motives. I did not consider it as an attack upon me at all.

Mr. BRACKEN. I wish now to pay my respects to the gentleman from Rush, my colleague (Mr. Helm). He appears to be disposed to lecture some of us on account of our votes here: to say the least of it, he has insinuated that his colleagues were voting in a manner not in accordance with their pledges. I wish, also, to state what I know of that matter. I have a distinct recollection, that, during the campaign last summer, I personally took the position, that hereafter there should be no new State debt created either directly or indirectly. The position with which I entered upon the canvass was this: that we entered into the social compact for two purposes only: first, the protection of life; secondly, the right to acquire property; and its incident to enjoy it, and for this purpose only did we enter into the social compact; and, sir, if there was any objection taken to that position I do not know it.

It has been said that the two parties in the State have taken the same ground upon certain questions. So far as that is concerned, all I have to say is, that in July last, I held up the platform of whig principles to my opponents, and I asked them to endorse it. But, sir, not one of them would endorse it, so I know they were not bound by that platform at all. But we made the issue, once for all, that the State possesses no right to tax the citizens for internal improvement purposes. I told them if they wanted to make an issue, to do so, that I was perfectly willing to talk about the matter. Because I held that we never entered into the social compact for the purpose of erecting banks, constructing works of internal improvement, or getting up manufactories, and soap factories, if you please. We did not come into the social compact for any such purpose. We believed firmly that the State possessed no power to tax the people for any other purpose than those contemplated in the social compact.

I will give an example: Suppose there are two hundred and five thousand voters in the State, and the question before them to be that of a State tax to raise money for the prosecution of the work of the White Water Valley Canal, and that one hundred and five thousand of the citizens of the State vote to levy a tax of one million of dollars for this purpose. Thus they would tax the remaining hundred thousand citizens along with themselves, for the construction of this work against their will, and not to their benefit: and that hundred thousand citizens might possess and hold three-fifths of all the taxable property in the State: which would be a manifest act of injustice and oppression. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will cast from them every idea of a public debt, and lock the door and throw the key away. This system of a public debt does not enter into the civil compact. It makes up no part of the bond:—the right of life and the enjoyment of property.

If each State in the world, that has a Constitution—and all should have had a proviso in this organic law against a public debt, then would cease the necessity of those tax rolls that grind down the toiling millions of the civilized world. This want of power in governments to contract debts, would do more to keep the world at peace, than all the peace societies that have met, or ever will meet. You have a right to tax me only for these two purposes, of which I have spoken. You might as well tax me to buy a home for a man living in another part of the State, as to tax me in order to raise money for internal improvement.

I hope the motion to re-consider will not prevail. It is a plain question of right and justice. Whatever is right, it is presumed, is expedient; and that which is not right never can be expedient. Injustice and wrong never was expedient in any course of policy for the advancement of individual, State, or National interests. You might just as well say that A. B. have a right to tax C. for D.'s benefit, as to say, that the State has a right to tax one portion of our fellow-citizens for the benefit of another.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson now made an ineffectual motion for the call of the Convention.

The yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered upon Mr. Borden's motion to re-consider the vote of yesterday, by which the second section of the report was ordered to be engrossed, and the same being taken, the Secretary reported—yeas 49, nays 70—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Milligan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Shannon, Steele, Stevenson, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, and Yocum—49.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bracken, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of

Ohio, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

So the Convention refused to re-consider the vote.

Mr. BORDEN now said: This vote is evidently conclusive as to the judgment of the Convention upon this subject; but, in justification to myself, I desire now to offer the same proposition which I presented in the fore part of the day, when it was ruled out of order. Since the vote just taken is a most clear indication that the Convention is disposed to pass the section as it stands, I do not feel disposed to struggle in opposition to the will of the majority. I hope, sir, that the question will be taken at once, and without a demand for the yeas and nays, as that might have the appearance of a factious opposition to the will of the majority. I do this that I may place my views upon the record. The Convention may vote down the proposition; I offer it in justification of my course before my constituents. My proposition is, to re-commit the section to the standing committee on the State debt and public works, with instructions to insert after the word "article" the following, which I send up to the table.

The words proposed to be inserted were then read by the Secretary, and they are as follows:

"Unless such debt shall be authorized by a law for some single work or object therein distinctly specified, together with the amount; but such debt or debts, direct and contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not at any time exceed one million of dollars; and such law shall provide for the collection of a sufficient direct annual tax to pay the interest on such debt as it falls due, and also to discharge the principal within eighteen years from the contracting thereof, and the law levying such tax shall be irrevocable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and discharged.

"And on the final passage of such bill in either house of the Legislature, the question shall be taken by yeas and nays, and entered upon the journal thereof, and shall be: 'Shall this bill pass, and ought the same to receive the sanction of the voters of this State?' And no such law shall take effect until it shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the voters and have a majority of all the votes cast for or against it. No such law shall be submitted to be voted on within six months after its passage, nor until it shall be published in at least one newspaper in each county, if one be published therein, throughout the State for three months next preceding the election at which it is submitted to the people; and said law shall not be submitted at any general election when any other law shall be submitted to be voted for or against.

Mr. WATTS. I rise to call for a division of the question; and while I am up, I wish to say to the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) that I should be pleased if he could desist—

Mr. BORDEN (interrupting). I have said to the Convention that I did not wish to delay business. I do not intend to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATTS. This is the third time that the same proposition, substantially, has been definitely acted upon by the Convention, and they have decided every time by increasing majorities, that the section as it now stands shall not be modified. It has been a "Monsieur Ton Son come agen;" and this is the third time he has come. I do hope that favorable time will come for the advancement of business in this body, when gentlemen will be willing to yield to the will of the majority. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question is not divisible. You cannot commit without instructions.

Mr. WATTS. Well, sir, I move to lay the motion on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that the success of his motion would also carry the bill to the table.

Mr. WATTS. Well, I will take it back then. [A laugh.]

Mr. DOBSON. I do hope that the friends of the section will consent to be quiet, keep cool, and let us have a fair, free fight.

The yeas and nays were now demanded and ordered upon Mr. Borden's proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to state, in order that my votes may not appear inconsistent, that, whenever there is a decided vote upon a question like this, I always believe in knocking under. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWKINS. I desire to say one word touching this question. I desire to say, sir, that in all my votes upon this subject, I have endeavored to be consistent; and I intend that they shall be. I voted for the re-consideration, and I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) not simply for the purpose of justifying myself before my constituents, but because I was in favor of re-consideration, and in favor of some change of the section from the condition in which we have engrossed it. But, sir, when I see gentlemen come here, with instructions in their pockets, and act on a question of this kind for three or four days, deliberately voting, according to their own acknowledgment, against these instructions, till the principles embodied therein have been completely trodden down; and then get up here, and, for the simple purpose of justifying themselves before their constituents, offer a proposition, and ask the Convention at the time of offering it, to vote it down, without taking the trouble to call the yeas and nays, I confess, sir, that I am some astonished.

Mr. BORDEN (interrupting). Does the gentleman allude to me?

Mr. HAWKINS. I understood the gentleman, when he offered his instructions, to say to the Convention that he knew they would be voted down, and he did not desire the yeas and nays—

Mr. BORDEN. I did not say that. I said the vote just taken was a most evident indication that the section would pass. I did not wish to delay time by a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAWKINS. It all amounts to the same thing. The Convention had determined upon a particular course of action, and he asks the House merely to take such cognizance of his proposition as may justify him before his constituents. I hope, sir, that I may be ready now, and at all times, to act with frankness and candor; and I would be sorry, sir, to see the gentleman shrink from his principles—

Mr. BORDEN. How does the gentleman infer that I shrink?

Mr. HAWKINS. I understood the gentleman to say that he expected the Convention to vote down his proposition.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman was mistaken in regard to the remark.

Mr. HAWKINS. Very well, sir; then I suppose I must have misunderstood the remark of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. B). That being the case, I will, as a matter of course, withdraw the inference more willingly than I drew it. [A laugh.] I hope the proposition of my friend from Allen may carry. I fear, sir, that the section as it now stands will forever prevent the State from establishing a State Bank; at least we never can borrow a dollar more to add to the present Bank capital belonging to the State. I for one am not willing to so tie up the energies and necessities of our growing and prosperous young commonwealth. I, sir, am for a State Bank, with the capital of the State invested therein, the profits to inure to the benefit of the people of the whole State, and go to the education of the children of Indiana. I have no faith in the free banking system, as I believe it would be carried out, without the controlling influence of a State Bank to operate as a check upon it. If I should be correct in regard to my fears, that the section as it now stands will operate as a bar to the establishment of a State Bank—if, indeed, the friends of that kind of banking shall be, by the action of this Convention, foreclosed in their efforts to establish such an institution—and if, sir, in the progress of this question of banking, I shall ultimately be driven to the issue of "Free Banks" or "No Banks"—entertaining the same views that I now do upon the subject, unless my mind undergoes a radical change, I shall be found voting with the "No Bank" side of the Convention. I want the profits of banking in Indiana to go to the State and her citizens. I desire that the State and her own citizens shall retain the power in their own hands of guarding and controlling their own great financial and commercial interests. I am opposed to trusting such great interests to the brokers and bankers of Wall street, New York, unless they come in their own proper persons, without any disguise.

The PRESIDENT here directed the vote to be taken upon Mr. Borden's proposition, and the Secretary reported—yeas 35, nays 86—as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogen, Hovey, Howe, Lockhart, Logan, March, Milligan, Murray, Newman, Prather, Schoonover, Steele, Wallace, and Walpole—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

So the Convention refused to re-commit.

The PRESIDENT now announced the consideration of the third section of the report—the question being upon the third reading.

Mr. BROOKBANK. Before calling the names upon the final vote, I wish to make a few remarks, to set myself right as to the vote which I shall give.

I have heretofore voted with the minority, against "striking out," because I believe the people to be capable of self government.

But since the question has been decided against us, and there is no doubt but that it has been fully and fairly settled, that the Convention will not permit any further increase of the State debt, and considering it to be a matter of courtesy to acquiesce in the decision of the majority ; therefore, I shall vote for the third reading, rather than by voting against it, to indirectly vote the power to incur a debt, without any limitation, qualification, or specification.

Mr. STEELE. In defining my position, I here say that I shall vote against this section. In the district which I represent, I remember that all the candidates were agreed upon this subject, as may be seen by reference to certain resolutions which have been before referred to in this debate. We agreed that the Legislature was to be limited with regard to the power of borrowing money ; but not the people. I desire to explain this matter, so that it may be understood at home, that it has been declared here, as against the will of my constituents, for this Convention to block up and restrain the exercise and the power of the people.

The gentleman upon my left, (Mr Bracken,) has told us that he wanted to lock up the power to increase the State debt, and lose the key. That is the idea ; and I want it to go out to my constituents ; and want it to go out to the country that I protest against it, and declare, here in my place, that such locking cannot be found in all history. What ! lock up the power of the people at the ballot-box, and say that a minority shall govern ? This government of a minority has already been endured too long in this State, and to propose such a thing in a popular government ; is a step directly toward aristocracy. I tell the people, therefore, that now for the first time in the history of this State it is proposed to establish an aristocracy. Sir, I will not place my vote upon the journal there, in favor of a motion to manacle the hands of the people of Indiana. This is what I have said to the people ; and I now say upon this floor, that I have no instructions so to do.

A VOICE. That is the way with all of them.

Mr. STEELE. But one word further in regard to instructions. It is this, and it is a lamentable fact, that the extravagant expenditures of the country have been all effected by a few individual demagogues of the State setting themselves up to instruct the people. That is the idea. Let me tell you again, that instead of my constituents instructing me, I was all the time upon the stump, engaged in instructing them, [laughter,] and I am employed in the same business now. [Continued laughter.] I am throwing off here, and telling them that they will have to take this matter yet into their own hands, that they will have it yet to clear up for themselves.

A VOICE. "That is true."

Mr. STEELE. Sir, I have been very desirous to vote for every item of amendment which might be thought proper here, to place in the new Constitution, so that I might go home and say to the people, your work has been well done.

Your delegates have done much good and no harm. Such were my anticipations. But, sir, I am compelled now to fear that in this I shall be disappointed, for when you come up with a proposition to restrict the rights of the sovereign people, I cannot, for I will not, support it.

The PRESIDENT now directed the vote to be taken upon the adoption of the section, and the Secretary reported—yeas 91, nays 32—as follows:

AYES.—Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—91.

NOES.—Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogan, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, Milligan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Steele, Wallace, Walpole, and Yocum—32.

So the section was passed the third reading, and referred to the committee on revision.

Mr. OWEN now moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling him to introduce the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to insert in the second line of the second section, of number three, after the word "revenue" the word "or."

But the Convention refused to suspend.

And then upon the motion of Mr. Pettit, which was agreed to,

The Convention adjourned to Monday morning, nine o'clock.

MONDAY, Nov. 25, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BABE.

The journal of Saturday was read and approved.

Mr. THORNTON rose and said—

I rise, sir, for the purpose of asking a suspension of the order of business, to enable me to lay before the Convention a preamble and set of resolutions, expressive of the sense of this Convention in relation to the death of the late Col. Richard M. Johnson. It will be remembered that this matter was suggested to the Convention on Friday last by my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) but who, since that time, at the suggestion of another friend, from Ohio, (Col. Pepper,) has, in consideration of the relation I bore Col. Johnson, as having been engaged in the service with him as an officer in his regiment, deferred to me the performance of that melancholy and interesting duty. Whilst disclaiming any wish to seek any prominence on this occasion, I did not feel at liberty to decline the call thus made upon me by those two friends, and, in accordance with their suggestion, I have prepared a preamble and set of resolutions, which I herewith submit.

In presenting these resolutions, I will not attempt anything like a eulogy on the deceased. This is not the time, nor is it a fitting occasion so to do. Besides, Mr. President, I feel not only my inability to do justice to the merits of the distinguished dead, but I furthermore feel as if I were obtruding myself upon forbidden ground—that I should be undertaking the performance of a task which could be much more ably and appropriately performed by others. It is well known that Col. Johnson and myself, enough ever warm personal friends, were opposed in politics. He, as a member of the democratic party, and one of its most prominent leaders for a long series of years, is a circumstance which confers upon his political friends the right to take into their exclusive charge and keeping, the care and guardianship of his political fame and reputation. I shall leave to his friends the performance of that duty. All I shall essay will be to award to the memory of an esteemed friend and fellow-soldier that tribute which is justly due to it as such. In the beautiful and expressive language of Mark Antony, I may well say, "I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him."

The relation between Col. Johnson and myself commenced in the year 1812. Col. Johnson was at that time, and had been for some years an active member of the House of Representatives in Congress, from one of the districts in Kentucky. War had just been declared by the United States against Great Britain, and the Colonel, as a member of that body, had given to the declaration a warm and zealous support; and as an indication of his devotion to the cause, had procured from the General Government authority to raise a regiment of mounted men to serve for six months. It was to consist of ten companies of one hundred men each, to be under officers of its own selection. The Colonel having left the halls of Congress to attend to raising and equipping said regiment, I, then a resident of Bourbon county, Ky., for the first time became acquainted with him, having been introduced to him by his father, the venerable Robert Johnson, and his brother, Col. James Johnson, with both of whom I was at the time associated as members of the Legislature of Kentucky, they being from Scott, and I from Bourbon. The Colonel selected me as one of his intended officers, giving me authority to raise a company to constitute a part of his regiment. This was in the spring of 1813, and we were directed to be ready for service by the middle of June or the first of July. In pursuance of the authority conferred, I proceeded to raise the company and succeeded in so doing, and we prepared ourselves to be ready to march by the time designated. An unexpected event transpired, however, which rendered it necessary for us to march much sooner than was expected. The disaster of the 5th of May, 1813, which resulted in the defeat of Col. Dudley's regiment at Fort Meigs, induced Col. Johnson to call on us immediately, and accordingly we were ordered to rendezvous at the Great Crossings, Scott county, Kentucky, on the 20th of May, 1813, in order to go to relieve Fort Meigs, which was infested by the British and Indians. In consequence of this, only about one-half of the men engaged could, without great sacrifices at that season of the year, leave home. The result was, companies had to be consolidated, and my half company was attached to that of Captain Combs. This rendered it necessary for him and myself to draw lots for the command of the company, which he having won was commissioned Captain, and myself First Lieutenant.

We went into the service accordingly, and continued in it for the six months, during which time we traversed a considerable part of Ohio and northern Indiana. I was with Col. Johnson at the celebrated battle of the Thames, and charged along side of him in the onset upon the Indians, although we soon became separated, and I did not see him again until after the battle was over. He was in his tent, having been wounded in several places, was bleeding, as it were, at every pore, and though suffering intensely from his numerous wounds, he bore it without a murmur, and with unexampled fortitude and patience. It is unnecessary for me to advert to the manner in which the Colonel bore himself on that perilous occasion. There is higher and better testimony than mine. In the eloquent language of his commander, the lamented Harrison, "His numerous wounds proved his was the post of danger." His conduct on that occasion, as well as on every other when put to the test, establishes his reputation as a man of the most daring courage.

Mr. President, I have said that Col. Johnson and myself belonged to different parties. It is due to truth to say that there was a time when we belonged to the same political party, and remained so for years. During the war of 1812, we were both advocates of it. There was then a party whom we called Federalists, though not a very apt name, which was opposed to going to war with Great Britain, insisting that we had no cause of grievance against her, whilst we contended that the numerous outrages inflicted upon us in the imprisonment of our seamen, of instigating the savages to murder our helpless women and children, was just cause of war. To sustain this cause, the Colonel and myself had yielded our most hearty support, both in the councils of our country and in the field. We continued to be of the same party; and when Colonel Johnson was so bitterly assailed and persecuted for his vote in favor of the celebrated "Compensation Bill," I, at his call, left my own district and went into his, and gave him all the support that was within my humble means. He succeeded; but it was a hard race, and nothing but his scars saved him from defeat. In 1824, we both warmly supported Mr. Clay for the Presidency; but in 1828 we for the first time parted, he supporting General Jackson, and I Mr. Adams. In 1836, when the alternative was presented to me, either to vote for Mr. Van Buren, with whom Colonel Johnson was associated on the same ticket, or for my old beloved General, the hero of Tippecanoe, I unhesitatingly chose the latter. Again, in 1840, when the same parties were presented, I made a similar choice. How far either of us was right or wrong in the course we took as to that matter, should not be made here a matter of inquiry.

As a representative in Congress, Colonel Johnson was persevering and indefatigable in the discharge of his public duties. He never once flagged in his efforts to carry out any measure he undertook. This was most eminently tested by his long continued and unceasing efforts to wipe from the escutcheon of our country that odious relic of a barbarous age, imprisonment for debt. His exertions were, happily for the great cause of humanity, successful, and entitles him to the thanks of every friend of oppressed humanity throughout the civilized world. His celebrated Sunday Mail report, too, as indicating consummate ability and containing sound political doctrines, stands unrivaled as a State paper.

It is not pretended, however, that Col. Johnson possessed talents of a brilliant order. He was not one of those who aimed to shine as a political star. His were of the plain, practical, and useful character. When taking a retrospect of his public life, few of our public men have left behind them as many enduring evidences of usefulness to their country. In his private relations his unostentatious bearing and child-like simplicity of manner, made him ever accessible to the humblest and endeared him to all with whom he was brought into association. But, although thus mild, amiable, and unassuming in his manners, he still possessed firmness, and was unwavering in his purposes, and everything he engaged in he pursued with unabated zeal and determination. He was generous and liberal to a fault, and no one, however humble, ever appealed to his generosity and benevolence in vain. He possessed courage even to daring, and no man ever entered the field of danger with less fearlessness of consequences. In fact to sum up all, as was once well said of another, "he was a man, which take him all in all, whose like

I fear we ne'er shall look upon again."

Mr. President, I now submit the preamble and resolutions and move their adoption:

WHEREAS, This Convention has just learned with profound sensibility that the Hon. Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, late Vice-President of the United States, has recently, and whilst engaged in the service of his native State, as a member of the General Assembly thereof, departed this life: AND WHEREAS, the numerous long-continued public services of that distinguished patriot and soldier, as well in the councils of his country as in the tented field, constitute him the common property of our whole country, and justly entitle his memory to the grateful notice of the people of this State, in common with the rest of his fellow-citizens of the Union, and more especially, when it is remembered that a part of the services rendered by him, whilst engaged in the defense of his country in the war of 1812, against Great Britain and her savage allies, were performed upon the soil of Indiana, when an infant, defenseless territory, in defending our helpless women and children against the relentless tomahawk and scalping-knife of the ruthless savage:

Resolved, That we recognize in Col. Johnson the gallant soldier, the devoted patriot, and sound, able statesman: that among the long list of his public acts, whilst engaged in the National Councils, his zealous efforts in favor of abolishing imprisonment for debt, together with his masterly "Sunday Mail Report," will remain as imperishable monuments of his profound statesmanship so long as the sufferings of the oppressed and down-trodden debtor finds sympathy in the human bosom, or the cause of liberal principles has an advocate.

Resolved, That whilst cherishing a just sense of gratitude towards this distinguished citizen for his many important public services, rendered in behalf of his country during the course of a long public life, as the able, faithful statesman and brave soldier, we most sincerely condole with his numerous friends and relatives in the irreparable bereavement they have sustained in the loss of an affectionate and devoted friend; and with our sister State, Kentucky, in being thus deprived of his valuable services in her public councils.

Resolved, That ——— be appointed a committee, on the part of this Convention, to tender to the relatives of Col. Johnson the expression of our heartfelt condolence on the melancholy occasion, and that the Secretary of this Convention transmit to the Executive of the State of Kentucky a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

Resolved, That the editors of the several newspapers in this State be requested to publish the foregoing in their papers respectively.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley rose and said—

MR. PRESIDENT, I have delayed to the last moment for some better qualified gentlemen of the Convention to rise and respond to those excellent and appropriate resolutions, so well conceived and so expressive of the feelings and sympathies of this Convention.

But, sir, though they contain enough, and comprehend all that can be said, on this melancholy occasion, expressive of the deep affliction we feel for the public loss the nation mourns, yet, sir, I am not willing the occasion shall pass without the voice of private friendship and private grief being heard.

Sir, may I not say that a great man has fallen in our midst? Yes, sir, in our midst; for was he not our fellow-citizen? And are not his name and his fame our common inheritance?

But I will not dilate on his public character. Is not his history written to be read by all men? He was cradled in the times of the Revolution. He fought as a soldier in one war of Independence; and as a politician and statesman he has been prominent for nearly half a century. From the humble walks in life he attained the proud position of the second office in the republic, the Vice-President of the United States. Sir, the history of the republic cannot be written and leave out the name, and overlook the fame and public services, of Col. Johnson of Kentucky.

But, sir, leaving out everything adventitious in his character, he was a man, with the heart, and soul, and feelings of a man. This I had occasion to know.

Sir, in the year 1840, engaged in the public service, I resided in Washington City. He occupied the Vice-Presidential mansion. For some three months I was a member of his household; one-half of that time I was prostrated by fever, and was at the very door of death. And, sir, I can never forget, and I hope I never shall forget, his kind attentions and assiduous care of me. Sir, I was sick and feeble, but his sympathies appeared on my account as acute as my disease was painful.

Sir, the Vice-President's house at that time, was located in a part of the city surrounded by poverty and destitution; but Col. Johnson never forgot to meet and supply the demands that poverty made upon him. I know that his wood supplied many with fuel, and his table many with food.

He turned none away empty. In that little community on Capitol Hill I am sure his name is blessed and cherished. I suppose that Col. Johnson has died poor, for such a man could not die rich. In his hands money or property lost its adhesive quality if the calls of humanity demanded it.

Sir, in war Col. Johnson was as brave as Jackson—of death or danger, he was fearless as Worth, or Scott, or Taylor. But as a man, in his affections, he was tender as a child. The tale of sorrow never entered his ear and failed to draw a tear from his eye.

If goodness of heart, kindness of soul, and acts of charity, form claims on Heaven, then may we not say his spirit is blessed. Mr. President, I second the motion for the adoption of the resolutions.

The preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted; when

The CHAIR directed the blank to be filled with the names of MESSRS. THORNTON, PEPPER of Ohio, and RARIDEN.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to postpone the order of business to enable him to introduce a series of resolutions, which he was desirous of presenting at this time, in view of the fact that the Legislature would soon assemble. For the information of the Convention he would read the resolutions.

Mr. R. then read his resolutions as follows:

WHEREAS, The Congress of the United States, at its last session, on account of the controversies that had grown out of the question of domestic slavery, connected with recent territorial acquisitions, in order to allay all irritation, and reconcile all sections, passed a series of acts intended to accomplish this object: AND WHEREAS, Certain misguided persons, in some of the States, have manifested a purpose to set at defiance one of these measures, namely, the one in regard to the reclamation of fugitive slaves, and have given out from public meetings, and in published resolutions, that they will not obey its injunctions; that it is unconstitutional and void, and that those who have had any agency in its passage, or shall assist its execution, or counsel obedience to its mandates, are traitors to God and humanity, and recommend forcible resistance to its administration;

AND WHEREAS, We, the Delegates of the people of Indiana, in Convention assembled, coming from every county, and feeling that we know the public sentiment of the State on this subject, and fearing that such proceedings and public outgivings, if unrebuked, may tend to discredit the allegiance of the State to the Union, and the fidelity of our people to the Constitution and laws, and thereby bring us into disrepute with our sister States: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the members of this Convention, that the common sentiment of the people of Indiana is, that the whole series of compromise measures, passed at the recent session of Congress of the United States, were adopted with a view to reconcile discordant opinions, and to restore the peace, harmony, and integrity of the Union; that they are founded upon generous and patriotic concessions from all sections, and, if faithfully carried out, will realize the hopes of their projectors, in the restoration of confidence and kind feeling among the great sisterhood of States.

Resolved, That the obstacles often interposed to the reclamation of fugitives from labor, by the open resistance and subtle practices of the misguided, under the pretense of humanity, obedience to higher laws than the Constitution, made the passage of more stringent laws than the act of 1793 imperative, and was the true cause which led to the passage of the act of 1850, and that those laws ought to be observed and executed in good faith every where.

Resolved, That whilst the people of Indiana stand ready, at all times to uphold the laws enacted for the benefit of those who live in the slave States, they will be found equally firm in resisting all lawless designs, from whatsoever quarter, intended to break up the great confederacy of States; they are the friends of law and order, and devoted to the Union which our ancestors handed down to us, and are the enemies of all, whether in the North or at the South, who, upon any pretext, shall seek to overthrow it.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be transmitted to the Governor of each State and Territory of the United States, and to each of our Senators and members of Congress.

Mr. BORDEN rose to address the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to suspend the order of business.

Mr. BORDEN. Is it not in order to debate it?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, debate is not in order.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes and noes being counted, were ayes 60, noes 47. Two thirds not voting in the affirmative,

The order of business was not suspended.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HALL. In the proceedings of the Convention of Monday the 18th instant, a proposition was introduced by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) to refer the subject under consideration to a committee, to be composed of one from each Congressional district. The gentleman (Mr. Kent) made, on that occasion, some sensible and pertinent remarks, in which I entirely concur, but which I perceive have been credited to me in the published report. I take this public notice of the matter in order that the speech may be assigned to the gentleman to whom it belongs.

LIMITATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. OWEN in accordance with notice previously given, asked and obtained leave to introduce an amendment to the rules, so that no delegate shall speak more than an hour at one time, nor more than fifteen minutes in the following cases, viz:

1st. On any motion to re-consider a section that has been passed or engrossed.

2d. In any debate on the final passage of a section, or on a motion to refer the same.

3d. In any debate arising on a report from the committee on Revision.

Mr. OWEN. Whether the Convention adopt this amendment to the rule or not, they shall not, so far as I am concerned, be detained long about it. I do not object to the present half hour rule, as being in all cases, too stringent. In some cases I think it so; while in others, I consider it not restrictive enough. I think that, upon the first broaching of a subject, when the question is upon amending or on ordering a section to engrossment, the rule is improperly strict; but, in other cases—and they will become more numerous as the work of the Convention progresses—I regard it as not stringent enough. For instance, when a motion is made to re-consider a vote by which a section is ordered to be engrossed or passed, it is to be presumed that there has been already afforded pretty full time for debate. That is one case in which I think that debate might be properly limited to one-half the present allotted time. Again, upon the final passage of a section, after full debate had upon its engrossment, we may, under the present rule, still debate the question for half an hour. I propose to cut this down to fifteen minutes. By and bye we shall begin to receive reports from the committee of revision, and it seems to me that, in discussing their reports, fifteen minutes might suffice. These are three cases where it occurs to me the rule is not stringent enough.

While up, I will say one word more. Sir, the Convention will not, I am sure, suppose that I set myself up as a censor of its proceedings, if I make a few suggestions as to the best mode of shortening debate. There are ways and means of saving time, much more effectual than a half hour rule, if members are willing to adopt them. I suggest as one of these that each member confine his remarks strictly to the question pending before the Convention, be it of reference, or for the adoption of some special amendment, instead of indulging in a wide range of debate. I suggest, also, that great gain of time will be made, by wholly abstaining from everything like personality. Both of these operations are prolific sources of tedious and profitless debate.

I read the other day, in a newspaper of this city, a paragraph, which, although I am little in the habit of noticing such things, it may not be useless here to advert to. It is from a correspondent, who says:

"Here we are borrowing money to pay the expenses of this Convention, which is now a tax to the people of this State of about six hundred dollars a day, and day after day, nothing is doing but profitless debate."

"Nothing but profitless debate." It is not necessary to answer such a charge as that.

But again:

"Hour after hour is consumed in fun, revelry, vulgar anecdotes, stamping, hallooing, &c."

It will not suffer denial, that, though this matter is grossly exaggerated, scenes have been occasionally enacted here not very creditable to this body; and some which the respect due to age, ought to have forbidden. Such occur, unfortunately, in all legislative bodies. For the loss of time thence resulting, they are responsible, who originate or encourage them.

But it is to the conclusion of this article I desire especially to allude. The words are—

"Remember, gentlemen, the eyes of the people are upon you, and if you do not close your task by the 25th of December, you will hear a buzzing about your ears that you will not soon hear the last of."

This correspondent, whoever he is, knows little of the people of Indiana. Their sentiments were spoken to me a few days before I left home, by an old resident of my county,—one of that class whom it is sometimes the fashion to call "the hard-fisted yeomanry." Said he: "Mr. Owen, you are going to engage in an important work. Make us a good Constitution—take your own time to it, but make it as it ought to be; not one that will require to be patched up again, in half a dozen years." I believe that to be the true sentiment of the people. It is a just and proper sentiment. Our fellow-citizens will not justify a waste of time, but still less will they justify precipitate haste. They are willing to pay whatever expense may be necessary to make a good Constitution, I believe, and I think we have already an earnest of it—that our new Constitution will be the best ever made in the world. [Cries of "consent."] I believe it sincerely. If the expectation seem extravagant, I remind you, that, if it be the best among American Constitutions, it may justly rank as first in the world; for, where out of this Union, have organic laws been framed equal to those which govern the States of our confederacy? And ours ought to excel the others, for it is the last. We have the advantage of the light of experience to guide us. It ought, therefore to be the best. Let us make it so.

This restriction upon debate is a matter that does not touch me, not at all. The Convention knows, by this time, that my habit is rarely to speak over fifteen or twenty minutes. I have made but two speeches this session, (and both were on a favorite subject, introduced by myself,) which have exceeded half an hour in length. But I speak of the results of this rule as to others. The case of one gentleman occurs to me, a gentleman from whom I have frequently found myself differing, but always with reluctance; to whom I listen, and the Convention listens, with pleasure. I know his sensitive nature, and I know the effect of this rule upon him. I know that there are one or two important subjects upon which he desires to speak; and, from some words which have dropped from him, I believe that the effect of this half hour rule will be, to make him abandon his purpose. If it should be, the loss will be ours, not his.

It is upon modest and unassuming members, that this rule will chiefly bear. Others may be arrested, for the time, by the hammer; but, the first opportunity, they will inflict upon us another half hour. I do not say that the fall of that hammer has not, now and then, been a relief to myself; for some aimless and profitless speeches, it is, of course, our fate to endure; but the injury it does, in my opinion, exceeds the benefit from gain in time; and for that reason, I hope the half hour rule will be rescinded.

Mr. FARROW. I am not one of those, Mr. President, who consume much time in debate, but I nevertheless cannot subscribe to the doctrine that we ought to impose restrictions upon those who do. I hold that all questions that are proposed for our action should be debated. What is the object of debate? Its object is two-fold. First, to produce conviction on the minds of those acting here. That is a laudable object; and it seems to me that whenever such conviction or change of opinion is produced, in ninety-nine cases out of an hundred, it is produced before the first half hour's speaking. At any rate, there is a period of time in every speech when conviction is produced. The object is to find out where that point is. There is another object which is important with those in the habit of speaking at length, and that is to spread what they say before the public eye, so as to give our constituents an opportunity to know the views that that one entertained.

But the great object is to bring the Convention to a right conclusion; and the sooner that can be accomplished, the better. Any rule which will have a tendency to hasten that action, is the best rule that can be adopted.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Spencer, and upon a division, ayes 53, noes 39, it was adopted.

The question recurring on the amendment as amended, it was by ayes 60, noes not counted, adopted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the section reported from the committee on rights and privileges in relation to the exemption of a certain amount of the property of the debtor from forced sale.

An amendment had been moved by Mr. Borden, to insert the words "real or personal" before the word "property."

The pending question being upon an amendment to this amendment, in the following words:

"And that a homestead owned by any person, the head of a family, in this State to consist of land or town property, not less in value than five hundred dollars, shall be exempted from seizure and sale, by any legal process whatever, for any debt contracted after the adoption of this Constitution; Provided, That such exemption shall not affect in any manner, any mechanic's lien or any mortgage thereon, lawfully obtained; but such mortgage or alienation of land, by the owner thereof, if a married man, shall not be valid without the signature of his wife."

"SEC. — The Legislature shall, in addition to the present exemption of personal property, add to it, in the case of those persons who are not land-holders, such additional amount in value of mechanics' tools, farming utensils, and other personal property necessary to the business or support of such persons, as the said Legislature may deem expedient and equitable."

"SEC. — The Legislature shall pass such laws as are necessary to carry into full force and effect all the provisions of this article."

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the section and pending amendments on the table.

Mr. COLFAX (addressing the Chair). I understood, sir, that I was entitled to the floor from Saturday.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion to lay on the table?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir, for a few remarks, but they must be brief.

Mr. COLFAX. Will the gentleman condescend to allow me half an hour? [A laugh.]

Mr. COLFAX. Although admonished by the gentleman who has withdrawn the motion to lay the proposed Homestead Exemption upon the table, that I must be brief, I beg leave to say, once for all, that I was sent here by the people whom I represent, to advocate reforms deemed by them necessary and expedient—to present and defend their views—and to stand up, even if alone, in the advocacy of what they deem to be right. I expect, sir, to perform that duty so long as I may have a seat here, and with equal fearlessness, whether those views chance to be popular or unpopular in this Hall. My constituents have made up their opinions independently for themselves, as they had a right to do, as part of the people of the State; and I hope, when I return them the trust confided to me, not to be amenable to a charge that those opinions were not represented here with equal independence.

From all the indications since the meeting of this Convention—from those evinced last Friday and again to-day—it would seem to have been pre-determined that the Homestead Exemption should be defeated; and, from the unwillingness even to allow its friends to be heard in its support, it would appear that it was also the intention to strangle it without debate. Having, however, obtained the floor, I desire to speak in its behalf, even if to unwilling ears; and I shall be strengthened in the remarks I shall make by the consciousness of being supported in this advocacy by the whole body of my constituents, with scarcely a dissenting voice. I shall confine my remarks, in the limited time prescribed by the rule, to the subject of the Exemption of the Homestead, it being conceded on all sides that, if that principle prevails, an exemption will also be made to those who are not landholders, of mechanics' tools, farming team or implements, or other personal property.

Let me add here, Mr. President, to avoid being misunderstood, that every friend of this principle asks only the incorporation of the outline of their system in the Constitution, the amount, the nature, and the beneficiaries of the Exemption. They ask that it shall thus be incorporated in the instrument which we are framing, as is the Judicial system, the Banking system, Corporations, and other prominent subjects that are before us—that its bounds and metes shall be defined, its features established, its provisions acknowledged as worthy of a permanent and irrevocable place in the organic law, and the Legislature commanded to carry out these principles, as is obligatory upon them in the case of all others in the new Constitution, by the enactment of such laws as may be necessary to give them full force and effect. This, sir, is our answer to those who object to the recognition of this humane principle, and who contend that it should be left, without a word relative to it in the Constitution, for legislative decision.

I shall advance what may perhaps be considered a bold proposition. I shall contend that the Homestead Exemption is a measure that injures no class, but that, on the contrary, will prove beneficial to the CREDITOR generally, to the DEBTOR, and to the STATE. I confess, that when I look upon the strenuous opposition which it encounters here, this must be considered a bold declaration; but I honestly and sincerely believe it to be true.

In the first place, then, would it not be beneficial to the CREDITOR class generally? What, sir, is the effect of the operations of the present law? You or I, or some other person, may own a small property, and may also owe a half-dozen or a dozen debts, averaging one or two hundred dollars each. Under the present statute, nearly all debts, evidenced by notes or due-bills, waive the appraisement laws, and property sold under them, is knocked off to the highest bidder, without any regard to its real value. Suppose reverses to come upon the debtor—and who is safe or exempt from them?—he becomes embarrassed, unable at the moment to pay, and what is the result? The most avaricious of all these creditors—the man with the flintiest heart and the most frozen sympathies—he who could coolly sacrifice the only home of a poor man, while its owner lies writhing in pain and sickness within—he makes haste to secure his debt. He urges on the officers, and what property the unfortunate debtor owns is sacrificed that Shylock may not lose his claim. While those generous-hearted men, who, seeing their debtor's situation, are willing to postpone the time of payment—to give him a breathing spell before turning him out of house and home—those creditors who have waited and been lenient, find the property exhausted, or nearly so, by the less deserving, avaricious man, who has secured his debt regardless of all others. And this, sir, too often occurs even when the solvency of the debtor is only suspected. The operation of the present law is precisely this, and precisely wrong. It favors the man with the hardest heart—the smallest soul. It operates against the kindly creditor—the lenient man.

And how can such a policy favor the creditor class generally. No matter how anxious may be the man, who has been temporarily prostrated, to liquidate his liabilities—these debts which still hang over him unsatisfied—how can he do it? His means are all exhausted—the property, by which he could procure wherewith to pay his debts, is gone—a dependent family is by his side, who must be clothed, and fed, and supported by his toil—and you have taken from him what would be his greatest assistance in the performance of this sacred duty. These debts still hang over him to paralyze his energies. They are a warning that, if, by the severest labor, he should chance to be able to earn a little ahead, that little might be swooped upon and sacrificed as had that which he had owned before. You thus stifle all the energies of his character. And yet, if he does not, and cannot pay, the law and the creditor looks on him as a knave, and the ban is upon him. Will gentlemen look back at their own experience, and tell me if this has not been the result of the operations of the present law, in many similar cases that have come under their knowledge? Some, thus persecuted, do labor on and finally throw off the burden upon them. But how many, when the homestead that it has cost them years of toil to purchase has thus been swept away from them, become indifferent to the future—supine—careless as to earning more than a bare living for themselves and family; and how many more leave, with the slender remnant of their worldly goods for some far-distant State or Territory, leaving alike their debts and creditors forever.

But, when the Home is left, he has a tie to bind him to the soil—he has a roof to shelter his family—he has a little spot of ground to till for their support, and to earn from, for his debts. He has something, which, with labor, will produce revenue. And, if an opportunity is afforded to earn handsome wages at a distance from his residence, he, unlike the beggared Homeless, can leave his family comfortable, even if he leaves them to support themselves by their own labor, while he is amassing that which is to release him from the burden of debt, and again make him really free.

But, secondly, I hold that the Homestead Exemption will be a benefit to the DEBTOR class. And here let me state, what is, or ought to be, generally understood, that we contend for no retrospective act. We ask for its application only on debts hereafter contracted. Gentlemen have compared this measure to the National Bankrupt Law, but the comparison is neither true nor just. The Bankrupt Law operated on debts previously due; but this will only operate on debts incurred under its provisions.

Can there, sir, be anything unjust or improper or unwise, in providing that every man should have a Home—a little, humble home—exempt from legal process—that he and his could call their own, beyond all contingency, secured beyond accident or misfortune? But some few gentlemen meet us there, and say that that is the very reason why they oppose it—that, under its operation, a man who has not $500 worth of property cannot obtain any credit whatever. Exactly similar was the argument by which the great Reform of the abolition of Imprisonment of Debt was resisted in this very State—in this very Hall. It was argued most strenuously that the power of the creditor to imprison his debtor, was actually necessary to the maintenance of credit—that were it not for this power, credit would often be refused to the poor man. And the friends of humanity, who warred against that barbarous provision, were forewarned that they would ruin credit, derange business, encourage fraud, and work evil, and only evil, by the change. But, sir, their predictions were disregarded. That reform, demanded by benevolence and humanity, was at last effected. Did those dire results follow, that were predicted? No, sir, no. And there is not a man now in this Hall—scarcely a man in the State, who, having witnessed what experience teaches as to the results of that change, would even think of returning to the old system of making poverty a crime, punishable by imprisonment. Subsequently, small exemptions of personal property were made, and at each addition to them, until they have now reached $125, the same predictions were made—the same fears expressed—the same objections urged. Experience shows the fallacy of all these arguments. The poor man, if he is worth less than $125, can always obtain credit if he has a character for honesty and integrity. It is a libel upon the mercantile community to deny this. And, sir, under the operations of the principle we advocate, even the most closely calculating trader will conclude that his debt is safer with property in his debtor's possession than if that property is at the mercy of some keen-eyed, heartless creditor, who would quietly but quickly pounce upon the little all of his debtor at the first glimmering of suspicion.

Again, sir, I advocate this principle because it recognizes the most sacred duty, the most binding debt that a man can owe—the debt of Home and Support to his family. Mercantile debts, business liabilities, endorsements, I would recognize them all, but above them—higher, holier, than any of them—is the debt to the Family. Other States have recognized this, and given it its appropriate place, taking precedence of all others. Staid Vermont has done it; Connecticut, too, which is not apt to move rashly; and Iowa and Pennsylvania, Georgia and Texas, Wisconsin and Minnesota, Deseret and California; Michigan, whose Constitution, embracing this feature, even though it made it, in the opinion of many, too high, has just been ratified by a vote of four to one; our sister State, Ohio, and the great Empire State of New York, never too prone to lend an open ear to Reforms—all these, and more, have recognized and enforced this principle. And yet here, in Indiana, where it was supposed the spirit of progress and philanthropy prevailed to an eminent degree, it is almost impossible for an advocate of it to obtain a hearing on this floor. Here, in this State, this Convention was ready to crush it; without a hearing. Are all these sister States which I have quoted wrong? And if it works so badly as its opponents predict here, why have not they noticed the fact and retraced their steps?

Accidents, Mr. President, may happen to all men. None are exempt. He who is rich to-day, may become a beggar to-morrow. The accidents of fire or of flood, commercial revolutions, the dishonesty of others, endorsements, or, oftener than all, sickness, may reduce a man of limited means almost to bankruptcy. And, if they do, the law most kindly steps in and finishes the work. It ends the destruction which accident commenced. It crushes him to the earth, and while he writhes there, it brands him as a knave and a cheat because he does not rise. Sickness chains him to a bed of pain, and while thus there, it punishes him by the sacrifice of his property, because he is not well and at work, earning money to pay his debts. Is this the true policy of the State?

It has been falsely charged upon a great American statesman, that he declared the true policy of Government to be, "to take care of the rich, and the rich would take care of the poor." The sentiment has been branded as a libel by him to whom it was attributed, and all parties combine to disown any approval of the idea that it inculcated. But, sir, we should be careful that our action here should not be justly amenable to such a charge. I contend, most sincerely, that when we are framing a Constitution, we should take special care to declare and uphold the rights, and defend the interests of the poor. They have a special claim upon us for our protection. The rich can bear almost any legislation. Their interest and their influence is powerful. But I go further; I say it is not only our special duty, but our first duty, to shield the poor, to protect, to encourage, to elevate them. The sentiment would be more truthful and more correct if it read, "take care of the poor, and the poor will take care of the rich." They are not only our most numerous class, if we include among them all who are worth less than $500, but they are our main reliance, our main support, both in Peace and in War. When the trumpet sounds, and the flag of our country is unfurled, it is that class which comes to the rescue, which fight your battles, which win your victories—whose feats of daring not only gain the triumph, but give glory to your generals. And when peace prevails, they build your roads, dig your canals, fell your forests, and make the wilderness blossom like the rose. They add to the wealth of the State by what their labor extorts from their little plots of ground, or what their industry creates in other industrial pursuits. And should they not be protected? Let me ask, sir, one question: is the exemption of $125 from seizure for debt, right or wrong? Is it founded upon just or unjust principles? For, if it is right, then I contend that it should be increased from its present inadequate amount to something that will be substantial, and that Indiana should at least do, what she has never yet done to the amount of a single dollar's worth of real estate, exempt a home of a limited value from the gripe of the law's officer.

In the third and last place, I contend that the Homestead Exemption would be beneficial to the STATE at large. Let me state at the outset, a single, simple proposition, which I am sure no one dare deny. It is, that immigration adds greatly to the wealth and advancement of a State. And, sir, the neglect heretofore—the refusal, I may say—to pass a Homestead law, has had the direct tendency to repress immigration hitherward, especially those from foreign lands, who have been, in such large numbers, seeking homes in the west. The northern tier of States, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa have each passed liberal Homestead laws—the former largely increasing the amount in her new Constitution. The emigrant knows this—sees this. And he knows and sees further, that if he casts his lot with us, the humble home which he may purchase for his family may be swept away from them, if an acclimating sickness or any other temporary misfortune may happen to them. He knows and sees that Indiana protects barely a small pittance of personal property, but not a dollar's worth of that which he has journeyed for, thousands of miles—a home. And when this vast array of emigrants look at this picture, and then contrast it with the liberal legislation of the three States I have named, is it any wonder that the mighty tide sweeps on past our borders, and fertilizes and improves and beautifies other States than ours?

It will also tend to elevate character. The poor man will know that his credit will depend on his honesty and promptitude more than on his property, and he will strive to build up and maintain a reputation that will be thus valuable to him. It will also avoid the necessity which, in the minds of so many, under the present law, drives them to smuggling their property into some friend's hands, or making a conveyance of their home, which is tainted with fraud, rather than to see their little all swept away by some merciless creditor, and their family turned out upon the world, with no roof to shelter them from the storms of adversity.

It will be a stimulus for every man to procure a home. He will feel that labor is attractive, when its earnings are to purchase a house and home which he realizes is his own, under all circumstances, beyond loss by accident or calamity. It will be an incentive to industry, a sweetener of toil.

It will most certainly, undeniably, tend to increase the number of landholders in every community and consequently, the property of the State. In military and feudal ages, as has been well remarked in a report on this subject, great States might exist while the FEW owned the lands and THE MANY were serfs or tenants. But in this age, for men to be contented and happy, and States to be prosperous; families must have homes, secured to them inviolably. Most truthfully has it been said:

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made,
A bold geomanry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed, can never be supplied."

Thus increasing the number of landholders, you infuse into them a deeper, stronger interest in the social progress of the neighborhood, in the peace, the morals, and the welfare of the community, in the advancement and prosperity of the State. They become warmer friends of improvement in schools and roads—they become sterner foes to vice and crime.

It recognizes another principle which is to me a valued one—that States and nations should, as far as possible, shape their legislation so as to secure to man a sufficient share of air, water, and earth for his support and existence. We cannot it is true as a State, furnish land for the landless, but we can provide, in a manner that, like the present proposition, injures no one, impairs no vested right, operates on no previously incurred debt, that he who can by his labor, procure a home, shall have that home secured to him beyond peradventure.

It is urged against the introduction of this proposition here, that it is more appropriately within the province of the Legislature. My senatorial colleague, (Mr. Miller of Fulton,) has proven already, that the Legislature last winter thought it most peculiarly the duty of this Convention. And thus it is banded about from one body to another and back again, without action in either. But I hold, sir, that it is a reform peculiarly within the consideration of a Constitutional Convention. The Legislature is elected mainly for the purpose of representing local, or sectional interests, and each member of it is peculiarly the representative of his own constituents. But a Convention like this is assembled for a different purpose. Their main duty is to define, establish, and protect the rights of all classes of our inhabitants—to defend the weak against the aggressions of the strong—to establish bulwarks for the humble against the power of the mighty—to adopt and promulgate principles which will tend to the prosperity and the happiness of all. And each member here is a representative not only of his own immediate constituents, but of the State at large. In his votes here, he looks, or should look, to the welfare of all—he thinks, or should think, of the interests of all—he guards, or should guard, the rights of all.

Mr. President, the time must come, sooner or later, when the Home shall be secure—when the cabin of the poor man shall be really his castle. The time must come when the writ of the Sheriff shall be powerless at its threshold. Then indeed will it be truly a Home. Humble though it may be, it may be the place to which its owner has brought his bride from the paternal roof—it may be the birth-place of his children—and in its quiet garden, may repose all that remains of some of them, who have been too soon transferred to a securer Home in another world. Humble though it may be, the tenderest associations cling around it, and their severance is like the snapping of the heart-strings of life. That Home, to which he looks during his days of toil for rest, whose inmates around the hearth-stone, so often chase away the cares and sorrows which may cluster around his life, must be, at some time in our legislation, if not now, rendered secure and sacred. And when that is done, and not till then, will Indiana have done her part in hastening the coming of that period, when, in the beautiful symbolic language of the Scripture, every man can sit under his own vine and fig tree, with none to molest or make him afraid.

Mr. HOVEY said: Mr. President—As this is to be a political slaughter house, if it we believe some of the prophets of this Convention,

I suppose that the subject under discussion may be considered one of the blocks upon which "Mr. Fowler's martyrs" are to suffer death. At least it would seem so to me as I see many of the ablest debaters of this Convention shunning it as though its touch was contagious. For my part I shall not dodge the responsibility I, sir, for one, feel disposed "To beard the Lion in his den,

The Douglass in his hall;"

And to express freely and fearlessly my opinions in regard to the homestead principle, and what I think will be its effects upon the country, should it pass in the form proposed.

In investigating the principles of any particular law, it is sometimes both interesting and instructive to trace it back to its original source. In different ages and countries, chameleon like it will be found to change its apparent hue so as to meet, as far as practicable, the tastes, passions, and prejudices of its votaries.

Four hundred and eighty-six years before the Christian era, Spurius Cassius, an ambitious demagogue of Rome, was raised to the consular dignity. Historians inform us that his whole soul was directed to the accomplishment of his ambitious designs, and that to more effectually court favor with the multitude, he caused to be passed a law limiting the number of acres of land to be acquired by any one citizen, and dividing the conquered land equally among the Romans and the Latins. The Romans, displeased with being equalized with the Latins, and perceiving the dangerous ascendancy which Cassius was daily acquiring over the public mind, accused him of treasonable designs in aspiring to the sovereignty—tried, condemned, and threw him from the Tarpean rock. Soon after his death his law was repealed.

About a century after this period a wealthy plebeian of the name of C. Lucius Stolo, married an influential and ambitious patrician lady, whose whole thoughts consisted in devising schemes by which her husband might be elevated above his plebeian kindred. He was elected Tribune, but still she was not satisfied, and stimulated him still further to court the breeze of popular favor. Accordingly he promulgated the famous "Licinian law," which prohibited any citizen from acquiring or holding over 500 jugera of land, (300 acres,) and not exceeding 100 bullocks, and 500 goats or sheep. This law was at first hailed by the poorer classes with acclamations of joy, as the wealth of the few was thus to be divided amongst the many. But strange to tell Stolo was the first man who was victimized by this law. He was found attempting to conceal his ownership of 1000 jugera of land, severely fined, and one half of it taken from him.

For more than two hundred and fifty years succeeding no agrarian movement of any import was made, and probably never would have been again, in Rome, had not the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, induced her son Tiberius Gracchus to advocate the re-establishment of the "Licinian Law." He aroused the people to a state of phrenzied excitement, and fell a victim in the storm he had himself created. Eighteen years afterwards his brother Caius followed in his footsteps, and by his energy and eloquence created so great an excitement that the Roman Republic was shaken to its centre. The scenes that followed must be vividly impressed upon the minds of all who are acquainted with Roman history—the poor against the rich, the father against the son, the son against the brother and the father. Rome on the brink of ruin, threatened with intestine destruction, hung as it were upon the mere breath of that eloquent, heartless agrarian demagogue. Reason, however, at length prevailed. Caius paid for his ambition with his life. The blood of over two thousand of his followers was poured upon the altar of his ambition, and Rome was once more restored to tranquility and peace.

And now, sir, without tracing this historical chain any further, (which my time will not permit me to do,) I think I can see, through the dim distant twilight of the past, the "Licinian Law" casting its gloomy shadow until it has reached the present age. The arguments of Cassius of Stolo and the Gracchi are resounding through England, America, and France. Give us homes and an equal division of property, cry the agrarians of England. Down with the rich, and an equal division of the stealings, scream the wild, infuriated "sans culotte" of France. Permit us to use other men's property as our own under the sanction of law, is the more gracious language of the followers of those great Romans with us. Yes, sir, hide it as you will, disguise it as you may, the Homestead and the Licinian law have been woven in the same loom and are both of the same texture—the web other men's property, the woof the prejudices of the poor against the rich. The Licinian law took the property of one class and divided amongst another. The amendments proposed would have the same practical effect as they would permit one class, under the guise of contract, to obtain the property of another, and then keep that property under the sanction of the law.

In several of the debates which have been made in this Convention, some gentlemen seem to have lost sight of the distinction between the truth of abstract principles and the propriety of carrying such principles into practice. For instance, it was urged a few days ago with great warmth, that all mankind are free and equal—a proposition, in the abstract, that no reasonable man will deny. But the inference that was drawn from that proposition that negroes and mulattoes should therefore be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the whites under our peculiar condition, is not quite so clear of demonstration; and the same gentlemen, by their votes, have so indirectly declared, when they, with every delegate in this Convention save one, (Mr. May,) voted to prohibit the colored race from the exercise of the elective franchise—a right as inalienable and natural, in the abstract, as the right to enjoy liberty or life. Again: under that abstract principle, woman is entitled to all the political rights of man, the right to vote and the right to hold office; yet none but a few Quixotic knight errants have ever dreamed of casting the mantle of political power over her shoulders. An abstraction of a similar character has been contended for under the sections now under debate. It is this, that God gave the earth to man for his inheritance, and therefore every man is entitled to enjoy it. Now that abstraction is true, and man does enjoy it; but the argument that they attempt to deduce from that fact, that all men should be entitled to homesteads is to my mind anything but clear.

God gave no man a right to any particular spot, but an undivided interest in the whole. The location of his right to the soil is the offspring of contract, which was found to be necessary for the peace and quietude of society. If all were permitted to claim the same spot, feuds and discord would never cease. No man could assert that the roof that gave him shelter to-day would be under his control to-morrow, as a stronger hand might wrest it from him.

The first question that a legislator should ask himself should be, what is to be the moral effect of the law proposed to be enacted? Will its impress upon the character of the people be good or bad? Will it elevate or will it degrade? Will it purify or corrupt? I care not how much that law may benefit a particular class, or even the State at large, in a pecuniary point of view. I care not even how popular it may be, if he believes it will leave an impression on the public mind unfavorable to the principles of integrity and honesty, it would be his duty to pause, and not only to pause, but resign, before he should lend his influence to the passage of such a law.

Let us, then, ask what will be the moral effect of the amendments to the section under discussion if adopted? The solvent man needs not their protection. The only class that can be benefited by such provisions would be those who should become involved in debt beyond their means of payment. Now, sir, would it be conducive to public morals to place that class comparatively above want by giving them homesteads—homesteads purchased with the funds of other men—or would it be more in accordance with the principles of ethics, to tell them plainly, "You must pay your honest debts?" To test the morality of this law, let us examine it a little further. There are two men, bound together by the ties of friendship; one has five hundred dollars in cash and the other has nothing. The one who is penniless relying on the ties of friendship, applies for the loan of the five hundred dollars, obtains it, and immediately invests it in a homestead. The friend who loaned the money in a few days applies for payment. Judge of his astonishment when he is informed of the manner in which it has been invested, and that his friend claims the exemption of the homestead principle.

Can it be possible that any law thus nakedly admitting of legal swindling, can meet with the approbation of the citizens of this State? Laws, instead of laying traps for men's consciences, should always, on the contrary, remove every temptation possible.

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," should be the united prayer of the governors and the governed.

There is another point of view in which I wish to present to the Convention, the effects which I think will ensue from the adoption of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Huntington, (Mr. Murray.) To those who believe credit to be a curse—to those who would abolish all laws for the collection of debts, I have nothing to say. Such men are entirely beyond the reach of any argument that I may offer. But those who with me, see in a healthy credit system the means by which the poor man may be raised from poverty to wealth—the means by which indigent artisans, farmers, and laborers may in a few short years, be placed above penury and want—such, will look upon the adoption of these amendments as the death knell to all their hopes for the poor.

What is the history of those who have made fortunes among us? As an illustration I will take the farmer boy, who leaves the home of his childhood penniless on arriving at the age of manhood. His character being as yet scarcely formed, and almost entirely unknown, he lanches forth with a bold heart, and a strong arm. He applies to some landholder to rent a farm for the season on a credit, and obtains it; he purchases a horse and necessary farming utensils on credit; even his food and clothing are purchased on credit, and his expected harvest is regarded as the security for the payment of the whole. His harvest is at length gathered and sold, his debts paid and he has still a surplus left, which well rewards him for his labor. By two or three years operations like this, he acquires a surplus of means—purchases a farm by part payment and a credit for the balance, which is soon paid off and he stands an independent freeholder. In like manner, all classes of society accumulate property through the beneficent action of the credit system. Ask the laborer, the farmer, the mechanic, the physician, or the merchant, who has acquired property, what would have been his condition without the credit system, and he will almost invariably answer—poverty. But now, sir, let us suppose that this homestead principle is adopted. What do you think would be the answer of the landholder, and those who gave credit to the farmer-boy upon a like application? They would inquire, "can you give us any security?" "No." "Have you no friend that will assure us of our payment?" "No." "Nothing to pledge or mortgage?" "Nothing." "Well my young friend as you are not yet known in society, as you have never yet had the management of your own affairs, as your character has never yet been tested for honesty, and as the homestead law exempts more than you can acquire in the next five years, we cannot trust you." That poor young man has got to exist, he is compelled to make a subsistence, and let me ask you, sir, how will he do it? I'll tell you, with thousands thus driven from independent labor for themselves, they will be compelled to toil for their more fortunate and wealthy neighbors. And thus there being an over amount of hireable labor in the market, the price will be reduced and the poor will be completely within the power of the rich. I cannot sanction any law which would have the least tendency to produce that unhappy result.

But I am met here by the advocates of these homestead provisions, and told that credit is not based upon property, but upon honor. Let us investigate this position. I think, with all respect to other men's opinions, that that position is wholly untenable. Suppose a man of unblemished character, of the highest sense of honor yet poor, destitute, feeble and in the last stages of consumption, tottering as it were on over the very brink of the grave, should apply to you for the loan of five hundred dollars, for the term of a year. What would be your reply? You could not say to him "you are devoid of honor and I cannot trust you," for that would be a falsehood; but you would be compelled to say, "I doubt your means of payment, but not your honor."

The most desirable debtor is he who combines both honor and the means of payment. Honor so far as actual payment is concerned is but an empty sound; the other is more substantial.

It may be thought by some that I have now placed my poor boy in a bad situation, if the basis of credit is what I have just named. Not so. That young man's bones, sinews, and muscles, with energy, industry, and economy, constitute one of the surest "means of payment." Yes, sir, they are a mine, far surer to produce wealth, if rightly managed than the gold glittering sands of California.

In the next place, let us inquire what will be the effect of such a law upon the energy and intellect of the people. I know, sir, that the acquisition of gold has been cursed from the first down to the last of the poets.

"Gold, gold, in all ages the curse of mankind, Thy fetters are forged for the soul and the mind."

Such is the language of poetry, but not of truth. What was it that in a few short years peopled this western wilderness-like world with millions of happy and intelligent freemen? The love of gain. What is it that whitens every sea with the sails of commerce? Gold. What is it that lightens the poor boy's eye in his log cabin in the wilderness, when by the midnight lamp he pores over some old musty work of history or of science? What is it, sir, but the hope of glory or of gain?

Strike from the affections of man the love of property, and you will paralyze the intellectual progress of the world.

And now let me ask, if you adopt this homestead principle, what stimulus will the man have who is deeply indebted, to acquire anything above his mere homestead? None! He will settle down and refuse to exercise either body or mind for the acquisition of property.

But there is another argument alluded to by the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) and sometimes urged with considerable plausibility by the friends of the homestead principle. It is this, that unless some law shall be passed to prevent the accumulation of lands in the hands of the few, a landed aristocracy will spring up which will entirely overshadow the poor. And he cites the condition of England as a warning.

Now, sir, we have only to look back at the history of this country to convince ourselves that all these fears are idle. The States of New York and Delaware were once owned in fee simple by one man—the Duke of York. The whole of Pennsylvania by William Penn, and all that part of our eastern States between the 40th and 48th degrees of North latitude, “from sea to sea” was patented to the Duke of Lenox and about forty others. Remember, also, the large grants to Fernando Gorges, John Pierce, and others. The thirteen colonies were once in the hands of not exceeding one hundred men. What is the condition of those States now? Why, sir, divided into millions of separate interests. The old landed aristocrats are almost forgotten and it is with difficulty now that the farmer there can “monopolize” enough land to make a respectable farm.

And now, the inquiry naturally suggests itself, what has produced this great change in so short a time? Many things; but among the most powerful that has conspired to that result is one little law early adopted by our forefathers. A law that commends itself to every lover of justice and freedom—a law assuring to the citizen and his children more certain equality than all the charters ever granted by the kings of England to her down-trodden subjects. I mean, sir, the law of descent and distribution—that law which divides the property of the ancestor equally among all his children, male and female. So long as that law exists, a concentration of land in the hands of the few for any length of time cannot take place. In England, on the contrary, the law of primogeniture prevails, by which, on the death of the ancestor, all his real estate descends and vests in his oldest male child. Without that law the aristocracy of England would soon be reduced to their proper level, and with such a law in this country, there is not virtue enough in the whole of our free institutions to prevent a most powerful aristocracy.

Gentlemen who seem so fearful of the great land monopolies had better look closely to the provisions of the amendment. What would be the effect of that part which permits the owner to mortgage his homestead? My opinion is that nearly every man who would become insolvent under a provision of that kind would be tied down by mortgages to the keen, shrewd business men of our country. Credit with such could not be procured without security—a mortgage would follow to the merchant—while the mass, the farmer, mechanic, and laborer, would credit the same man upon honor, and when the mortgage should be foreclosed, they would have the consolation of knowing that honor is not payment. In this manner the tendency would be to throw the lands of the poorer and failing classes of society into the hands of the wealthy.

Now, sir, the view I have taken of this subject may be wrong. I make no pretensions to perfection in anything—and admit that I am at least as liable to err as those who assume the opposite side of the question. But I ask gentlemen if it is good policy to engraft new and untried principles into the organic law of our State? Would it not be better to leave such things to the action of the Legislature? That body can change, modify, and repeal, as the voice of the people may demand, but once adopt any principle in the Constitution, and it is locked up for the next quarter of a century to come. The gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) has stated that seventeen States have embraced the homestead principle in their constitutions. In that statement I am certain he is mistaken. There may be three that have taken that course, but that law, if it prevails in the others he has named, will be found in their statutory enactments.

I cannot conclude without saying that I think the amendments offered by the gentleman from Huntington would be unfair in their operation. If an exemption of five hundred dollars should be established in regard to real estate, I can see no sound reason why a like exemption should not be made to the owners of personal property. We should avoid making laws for one class to the injury of another. Without strong reasons to the contrary the general rule should be—no law for the rich—no law for the poor—but a law for the whole people.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton. I regret that there is so strong an indication apparent by a majority of the members of this Convention to smother debate and action upon this subject. The gentleman from St. Joseph could, with difficulty on this morning, get the floor, so anxious were some of the opponents to the Homestead measure, to have it instantly dispatched. Sir, that gentleman informed you, and I would add, that I know a very respectable portion of the State we represent, are in favor of engrafting into the Constitution the principles of a Homestead Exemption, as it is termed. I stated a few days since, in my place, and I am now prepared to show from the Journals of the House of last winter, that a bill incorporating the principles and details of a Homestead Exemption was introduced into the House of Representative at a very early period of the session, and after having been thoroughly discussed, was laid upon the table; not laid upon the table because it had not friends enough to pass it through the House, but because some of its friends, in view of the fact that the Convention, which was shortly to be in session, might think it right to engraft the principles of such a measure into the Constitution, thought best to wait until such action should be had as the wisdom of the Convention might adopt, after which, laws could be established more permanent and uniform on this subject. And, now, I regret to see such manifestations of indifference, and apparent determination to leave the matter to the uncertain action of the Legislature. And I now say that if the members of the House of Representatives of last winter, reflected the will of their constituents; that such a law was then called for and was only delayed until the Convention would act, hoping that it would lay some foundation on which to build a good Homestead law.

The bill to which I refer, as I stated, was introduced in the early part of the session last winter, and perhaps occupied as much attention as any other measure before the House, as the Journals will show, during which time the enemies of the measure used every means to defeat it. To prove what I have said, I have only to turn to the Journal of the House, where I find the ayes and nays called some twelve or fifteen times, motions made to adjourn, to lay upon the table, to indefinitely postpone, other motions and amendments made and offered, all for the purpose of defeating the measure. The bill, after being engrossed by a majority of some ten, was laid upon the table at a subsequent period, for reasons as before stated. The fact that the bill was engrossed by so large a majority, shows how the current was at that time; as such vote is always considered a test vote. I have given the reasons of some of the members who voted for the engrossment of the bill and afterwards voted to lay it on the table.

And some of the members of this Convention, that were members of the House last winter know this to be the case. And before I sit down, I must say that I regret to find my friend here upon my right from the county of Posey (Mr. Hovey) opposing the measure so strenuously when the Representative of that county (Mr. Carnehan) last winter was one of its strongest advocates, and if my memory serves me right, was on the committee that drafted the bill, and sir, I do not pretend to say that this Convention should look to the action of the House last winter. But I do say that a majority of the members of the House last winter, did expect and desire this Convention to engraft and prepare an article for the new Constitution permanently securing a Homestead to the unfortunate debtor.

Mr. BORDON. I rise, Mr. President, merely to explain the amendment I have offered, and not to go into any lengthy argument on this subject. The fact that we are now in the eighth week of our session and have made but very little progress in our business, should warn us to be careful and not unnecessarily occupy the time of the Convention. For this reason I have refrained from speaking except when the particular interests of my constituents seemed to demand it; and with regard to the present amendment I have offered, perhaps it is necessary that I should make a few words of explanation in regard to it. My amendment, sir, proposes to insert after the word "property," in the section the words "real," and personal."

Several of the States that have revised their Constitutions have inserted provisions of this kind in their Constitutions. The Constitution of California provides as follows:

"The Legislature shall protect by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the Homestead and other property (of all) heads of families."

This, in my opinion, is as far as this Convention should go. It simply establishes the principle and leaves the details for legislative action. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee on the subject of the homestead exemption, I think, goes too much into detail; and I am not disposed, either on this question, or that of the rights of married women, to go further than declare the principle—as I do not think a Constitution should go much into legislative details.—I feel myself under the necessity then, of going against the amendment of my friend from Huntington, (Mr. Murray,) and of retaining the original proposition, as I propose to amend it.

I wish here, sir, to allude to an observation that fell from my friend from Posey, (Mr. Hovey,) this morning, which, from the noise that prevailed in the Hall, I was not exactly able to understand. But I think he intimated that those persons who were the advocates of the Homestead Exemption, and who were disposed to go further, and hold to land limitation, were agrarians, or persons disposed to seize upon the property of the rich, and give it to the poor. And he also asserted that we were identical in principle with the agrarians of Rome, whom, he contended, desired to take the land from the wealthy, and divide it among the poor. Now, sir, I take upon me to say there never was such a party in the Roman republic; that it was a falsehood, first propagated by the historians friendly to the Patricians, and continued from one to another, until it has become to be generally believed.

Mr. B. here stated that the writings of Arnold, Niebuhr, Watchmuth, Schlosser, Savigny, and others—proved that some of the ancient historians were wrong in regard to their version of the circumstances attendant upon, and the persons who introduced the agrarian law.

The historians of Rome, he said, wrote as partizans, to justify the conduct of the Patricians. In the case of Manlius, who was put to death by the Patricians, Livy, and other historians, state that he was put to death by the Plebians; but it is now well established that such was not the fact, for he was put to death by the Patricians, for espousing the cause of the Plebians.

Mr. B. here proceeded to speak of the Licinian law, and read extracts from Arnold's Rome, to show that the position he took in regard to the character of the agrarian laws was correct.

Had not the Gracchi been put to death, continued Mr. B., by the Patricians, for attempting to execute the Licinian law, the nobility of Rome would have been prevented from seizing upon the public lands, and appropriating them to their own use and Rome would have remained forever a republic. The moment that the people were denied their share of the public lands, they were compelled to congregate in the towns and cities of that republic, where they could only obtain a scanty subsistence, and under the peculiar laws of that country, which reduced men to slavery, where they were unable to pay their debts, many of them became bondsmen for life. It was on the return of Tiberius Gracchus from Spain, that he passed through the finest portion of Italy, and he there saw, with deep regret, that vast portions of the country which, in the better days of the republic, had been cultivated by the hands of freemen, each man owning the soil which he cultivated, had accumulated in the hands of the Patricians, and was cultivated by miserable slaves, and by freemen in name, but who became brutalized by the rapaciousness of their creditors, and who, from their poverty and wretchedness, were but a few degrees removed from the slaves, with whom they associated. It was with a view to give these persons an interest in the public lands, that he proposed that the Licinian law should be executed.

In the days of Cincinnatus, the farmers left their plough and teams a field, and went out and fought the battles of their country victoriously, and then returned again to their agricultural pursuits; and this was truly called the better days of the republic; but when men were denied homes upon the soil conquered by their valor, and gathered in large masses around the cities, after having fought the battles of the republic, were denied, by law, the homestead privilege, what else could be expected than that the idle and vicious should after being employed by her ambitious men, in fighting in Asia and Africa, be induced by such monsters as Marius and Scylla, to turn the edges of their swords against the throats of their countrymen.

Sir, it was the combined evils of land monopoly and slavery, that overturned the republic of Rome. And let me here say, that, while we may never expect that in the free States of this Union, slavery will ever be directly tolerated; yet, sir, unless we shall restrict capital within proper limits, and prevent its having too much the advantage over the labor of the country, the time may come when the lands of this country may be monopolized to a much greater extent than we could now anticipate, and a state of things will be brought about not dissimilar to that which existed in Rome, in the days of the Gracchi.

I think, sir, seriously, that before twenty years shall have rolled around the land question will become the great question of the day, upon which will be decided the destinies of this people. In regard to the quantity of land which a man may own, I would not pretend to give the limitation; but I insist that man is entitled to live and to enjoy a portion of the earth, and that to enable him to do this, we should, under proper restrictions, prevent our public domain from being monopolized, as is now being done to a considerable extent, by large land companies. I do not propose to take from one man and give to another, but I desire that a limitation should be placed upon the amount of property that a man can hold in the soil. Look at the case of John Jacob Astor of New York city, who accumulated house after house, and absorbed them in one vast estate; leaving thousands without a home, because they could not be obtained. At the commencement of this session, I proposed the formation of a committee on homestead exemption and land limitation, but it met with considerable opposition, and the Convention decided adversely to raising a committee on the subject. Now it appears to me that gentlemen must be convinced that it would have been better to have raised such a committee. I will say here, in justice to my countrymen, that I have never seen a person, sir, who desired to have the real or personal property of another taken away and given to himself; but there is a party in this country who are in favor of preserving the public lands, so as to put the poorer portion of the present and the future generation, in some respects, on an equal footing with the more wealthy portion.

I will say, before I close, to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) that I can satisfy him of the truth of my position in regard to the agrarians of Rome, and that he much misconceives the character of the land reformers of this country, if he supposes that we desire to interfere with the rights of those who have already accumulated vast quantities of the soil of the country. Our only object is to preserve this continent so that it may afford a home to the thousands and millions that are to come after us, and that the masses shall not become hewers of wood and drawers of water, as is now the case in the countries of the old world.

I hope, sir, that that the proposition presented by the Chairman of the committee having charge of the subject of homestead exemption, will be voted down, and that we will simply declare the principle, and leave the details to the discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, I must, upon this subject, claim the indulgence of the Chair and also of the Convention for a short time, whilst I present my own views and those of my constituents upon this important question.

But first permit me to say, sir, that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) has not only been unfortunate in his references to Roman history, in support of his views, but he has been miserably so in reference to English and Scotch authorities. He has said that the English radicals entertained the same views and aspirations that the Roman agrarians did; that they desired to appropriate the property which belonged to others to their own use. Now, sir, this is not the case. I myself belonged to the class called radicals when I resided in that country, and I beg to inform the gentleman that a radical reform in political freedom was all that ever was meant or understood by the most ultra of that respectable and intelligent class known by the name of radicals in England.

Mr. HOVEY. I certainly did not mean to be understood as the gentleman seems to have understood me. I alluded to the agrarians of England.

Mr. DICK. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so, for it was a great misconception, indeed.

Sir, this question of a Homestead Exemption is not a novelty in the halls of legislation in these United States. Nine States in the Union have already adopted into their Constitutions such a law. It should not then be looked upon as an experimental or doubtful measure. It is true, these different States vary the amount exempted from $500 to $2000.

The principle itself in our own State is conceded, and has been engrafted upon our Statute law, for the last 25 years; during that time varying in amount from $50 to $125, which latter sum is now the amount exempted.

If the principle is a correct one, the amount exempted is pitiful. If the principle is wrong, why continue it? On the contrary, if 25 years experience has only confirmed the belief in its utility and augmented the amount, then, at least, we ought not to approach this subject under the influence of hostile and prejudiced feelings, but on the contrary, with marked deference and respect. The practical results of 25 long years experience are before us, and what evils have grown out of it? I answer, nothing at all.

Then, sir, all that is now asked of this Convention, is a still further augmentation of the amount now exempted; and it is but correct to assume, that from the rapidly increasing value of property in this State, the amount now asked to be established by Constitutional law, (which is $500,) in a few short years will not cover more property than the present amount of $125.

I am aware, sir, that this humane and beneficent measure may meet with vigorous opposition. There have been men found in all communities who have denounced every merciful measure proposed for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, excusing their conduct on the sordid and baseless assumption that the imprisonment of the debtor was the only security of the creditor; that, he who is not rich must be naturally dishonest, and would repudiate his debts. Such men, I fear, are still to be found lingering in our midst, yet they forget to describe the miserable condition of the wife and children of the husband who was lingering in jail to satisfy the vengeance of a vindictive heart; for every man knows that the jail is no place to make money to pay debts with.

Sir, it is just to pay debts, and every honest man will pay his debts if he has the means to do so. There is no conceivable condition in life so humiliating to an honorable man as that of being unable to discharge his debts.

But, sir, we must keep in mind that indebtedness is not criminal, and that even rigid justice does not require that women and children should suffer for the misfortunes or indiscretions of those husbands and fathers.

It is still held by the opponents of this measure, that we are indebted to the stringent laws of our land for the payment of our debts; that it is the mandates of our courts, the agency of our sheriffs, the interposition of our constables, that enforce men to be just to men. Nothing is more false; the reverse is the case. See how many thousands of dollars are collected and disbursed monthly, without the operation of law, and how few cents, in comparison, are collected by coercion of law. No, sir, it is that principle which is a constituent part our nature—that sacred monitor within—that fulfills every moral and pecuniary obligation which we owe to our fellows, and not the fear of legal enactments.

There is a point, sir, at which all things must necessarily terminate, and that point is inability. I only ask, then, that this terminating point may rest a few steps short of absolute want. Let a home to our wives and our children be preserved, let this humane object form a sacred exemption; justice and mercy demands that we should protect them.

Sir, we are all aware that without resources no man can pay his debts. Let us not, however, be misunderstood. In the introduction of this beneficent measure we do not ask, sir, an amount that will shield the dishonest and wealthy debtor from the just claims of his creditor.

This, sir, is far from our intention, and entirely beyond our purpose.

We have put the sum sought to be exempted to an amount that will at once address itself to the sense and sympathies, to the reason and justice, of our fellow men.

We ask only, to save and secure to the unfortunate and distressed part of our people, an humble home to shelter them from the peltings of the storm of adversity—the innocent, and not the guilty.

To sustain, sir, the proud characteristic of our citizens, is a duty we owe to posterity. We must prevent them, so far as practicable, through every vicissitude of fortune, under any concatenation of circumstances or events, (less than crime), from falling below the standard of independent American citizens. We owe it, sir, to our fore-fathers, who bequeathed to us every political blessing we enjoy. It is our duty as freemen, in order to sustain our liberties and to continue them, to guard against the influences of wealth over the necessities of the poor, and through this conservative system, sir, to preserve uncorrupt and incorruptible the purity of the ballot box. If my position, sir, is a correct one, it then raises the question into one of great national policy, which carries along with it every recommendation for its adoption; every feeling of our nature, calmly consulted, responds to it.

I also take the ground, sir, that in a moral point of view this measure presents itself with at least equal force and effect to the favorable consideration of every good man. Sir, it will, to a great extent, prevent crime. We know that in cases of extreme necessity, so strongly has nature implanted the principle of protection to ourselves and our offspring within us, that what we cannot retain with the consent of the law, we will endeavor to retain in violation of the law. Hence the numerous trials in our courts of justice for fraudulent conveyance.

But, sir, let us examine shortly the consequences of our present system, and see whether to strip a man of his means is the readiest mode of obtaining payment, or if that course is likely to make him a better citizen or a kinder neighbor.

When the last article of domestic comfort is swept away—when the family hearth is made desolate—what are the feelings of the victim of our present harsh laws? He is often driven to desperation or despair; he looks upon the world with disgust, his heart once warm is now chilled, and the bitterest misanthropic feelings are engendered. He asks himself if this is the natural results of misfortune; he is now an outcast from society; and why is it so? himself neglected—his family disregarded and shunned—his poverty makes him ashamed to claim, with confidence, his former acquaintances, who now seem desirous of passing him unnoticed. He dare not now claim a familiar seat at their once hospitable and inviting board; because he cannot yet stoop to accept what he is now unable to return. He dare no more invite his once familiar friends to look upon his squalid home. The world to him is now changed. It is a short but severe lesson in the journey of life. The table no longer presents the comfortable meal—the children no longer appear in comfortable habiliments. The idea of increasing and approaching wants bear heavily upon the sensitive mind. To deaden thought and shut out reflection he seeks to taste of the intoxicating draft, and o'er it repeats the story of the ills that do assail him, even to some transient listener, and finds, or thinks he finds sympathy with those who do not notice, yet surround him. His judgment gone, his reason fled, he now reels home the victim of a disease that soon carries him to a drunkard's grave.

Man, sir, is so constituted that he cannot stand the marked neglect of his fellow-men; philosophy gives way to circumstances, and all our fine spun theories vanish under the absolute wants of nature; and where, I would ask, sir, is the man amongst us in this august body, of age and experience, that can candidly and openly say with certainty how he would act under the same circumstances? I answer there is none.

What now remains? A destitute family is thrown upon the sympathies of the world, and the children are now bound or farmed out. What mother, sir, I would ask, exists that would not prefer carrying to the silent tomb, the children of her bosom, to seeing them thrown upon the chilling affections of a cold world? If there is a member here present who has seen a mother's anguish on the occasion of dispersing her little children amongst strangers, I would appeal to him. Every hope of maternal love is withered—every fibre of the sensitive heart is unstrung. The dearest, the strongest, the purest, and most holy emotions of our nature are sacrificed to the demands of an unfeeling world.

Who knows, sir, the feeble wants, and Constitutional infirmities of the child like the mother? Or if known, whose but a mother's care and love would watch with the solicitude of a ministering angel over its desires and defects. Who, but a mother, sir, can obey the high behests of Nature's God by instilling and cultivating those natural feelings and sentiments of affection, gratitude, and love? Who, but the mother, next to nature, stamps those indelible virtues on the ductile minds of youth? Who, but the mother, is destined by nature's great and irresistible decree to cultivate the heart of her offspring, which is often all the noblest and highest principles of our common nature.

And suffer me here, sir, to digress so far as to observe that if the education of the heart is neglected or overlooked, the cultivation of the head alone, can never make a great man or a good woman.

But, sir, apply this positive and unedceptionable rule to the female part of our community and it must necessarily produce the worst of consequences.

Sir, I regard a woman, destitute of those ennobling impulses and affections of the heart, as unworthy of the name of woman. A woman, sir, without a heart is like the gilded but unsilvered mirror. The soul is wanting there.

But, sir, regard for a moment the consequences which follow this system of violence done to the feelings of our natures. The bound child of charity when placed among strangers, looks in vain for the endearing and delightful language of the mother, the encouraging look of love, or the kindly reproof of affection, is not seen or heard or felt. The tongue that first taught the lips to move in prayer is not now near. All is changed. Still other children are caressed, preferred and doated upon; the marked distinction made sinks deep into the sensitive mind of childhood; children so situated reason and ask themselves and others of the cause. The cultivation of the better parts of their natures are entirely neglected in this state of servitude, they learn to reason without feeling, to decide without judgment, and to attribute everything to a selfish and sinister motive, and when the term of their bondage is complete, they go forth upon the world confirmed misanthropics.

This, Mr. President, I consider to be a great moral evil, a blight upon society, that alienates our common feelings, and stamps an equivocal characteristic upon our race, which is artificially produced by unnatural enactments and defective systems of legislation. How different the picture under benign laws. The necessities man like the child in infancy, requires to be nursed into maturity, instead of being chastised for his misfortunes. If by the operation of wholesome laws, he is neither subjected to neglect, nor reduced to absolute want or total destitution, in that case, it may be for the first time, he reflects upon the wisdom and generosity of his country's laws; this indulgence produces a feeling of gratitude, and often a strong inducement to great exertions in order to overcome those temporary ills with which he is beset. With some resources still left, his own honesty unimpugned, his family's necessary comforts unimpaired, he boldly stems the tide of adversity, with a strong arm and a stubbornness of purpose, which seldom fails of ultimate success, especially when seconded by the united industry of his willing family—his debts avertaken, and he again stands proudly before the world disenthralled. The parsimonious wretch, sir, or the rapacious creditor, would, for a few cold dollars and dull cents crucify the most interesting family in our State. They would not hesitate, sir, to carry distress into our dwellings, to unhouse our virtuous wives and helpless children, and this too, when we are offering an assylum to the oppressed of all the nations of the earth. Shall we, sir, turn upon our own kindred and nation and tongue, and sacrifice our own sons and daughters at the shrine of avarice and iniquitous laws.

Sir, I desire to have this provision engrafted upon our Constitution; I have no confidence in the Legislature. Sir, in ancient times, we are told of the confusion of languages at the building of the tower of Babel. But in modern times, we have improved upon that ancient precedent. In this volume of Statute Law, sir, (which I now hold in my hand,) we have thrust upon us, by our Legislators, a confusion of common sense, mixed with stupidity and folly—at one session they make laws—at another they amend them—at a third they explain them and at last they are palmed upon the people for their guidance and instruction, in such a crude and incomprehensible form, that the best disciplined mind in the State, cannot understand their meaning or intention. I hope, therefore, that the section as amended will pass.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Huntington (Mr. Murray) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden).

Mr. HARDIN moved to lay the pending amendments on the table.

Mr. BORDEN called for a division of the question.

The question then being upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Huntington (Mr. Murray) on the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, were taken with the following result: yeas 84, nays 28.

Those voting in the affirmative, were:

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogen, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Richey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Trimably, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—84.

Those voting in the negative, were:

Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, and Wheeler—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question then recurring upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) on the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, were taken with the following result: yeas 54, nays 55.

Those voting in the affirmative, were:

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Hogan, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tague, Todd, Zenor, and Mr. President—54.

Those voting in the negative, were:

Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Borden, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gregg, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Howe, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Yocum—55.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend by inserting after the word "property," in the third line, the words "an amount not less than five hundred dollars."

Pending the question,

On motion of Mr. WALPOLE, the Convention took a recess until two o'clock.

Mr. GREGG rose and said,—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to a question of privilege, growing out of a communication I have seen in the "Jeffersonian," a paper published in the county of Wayne. And I do not know, sir, that the subject matter to which I desire to call the attention of this body, for a moment, comes properly within the purview of our duties and responsibilities. I am aware, sir, that it would be wholly unbecoming in us to notice the anonymous communications of every irresponsible scribbler outside of this body, who may choose to malign our conduct and motives. Indeed, sir, it would be lowering our dignity, as a grave deliberative body, to undertake to rebuke every impertinent scandal-monger, who may choose to spawn upon the public the ebullitions of a depraved and vicious mind.

But, sir, the article to which I allude, and which I shall proceed to read presently, is said to be the production of an honorable member of this body. And as such—considering the source from whence it comes, if not the character of the communication itself—it may not be wholly unworthy of our notice. I am the more convinced, sir, that its paternity belongs to one of our own number, from the fact that I have seen other communications, over the same signature, and published in the same paper, animadverting upon the proceedings of this Convention, in such terms as go clearly to indicate his identity with, and participation in, those proceedings. I say, sir, I have seen published to the world other communications than the one I now propose to read, emanating from the same source, and reflecting upon the conduct of the Old Hunkers of this body, as he is pleased to term them, in language, which, if used upon this floor, would be promptly rebuked by your Honor.

It is much to be regretted, sir, that any member of this body should so far compromise the dignity of his position, as to seek to bring this Convention into disrepute with the people, by misrepresenting the conduct and motives of its individual members. There is much truth and meaning, sir, in the old but homely proverb, that it is a foul bird that dirties his own nest. But to the article itself—and I will give it to you in broken doses:

"INDIANAPOLIS, NOV. 13, 1850.

"Mr. EDITOR—The time of the Convention has been taken up, for the last week, in the discussion of rights of citizens and powers of corporations. There is a great diversity of opinion as to how far their powers shall extend. Quite a number of the members of the Convention are directors in public works—the White Water Canal has three—the Madison road has its defenders—the Bellefontaine company have their pleaders—and it's a kind of Kilkenny cat fight, as to who shall do the most plundering; but it is to be hoped that the rights of the people may not be everlooked in the general scramble."

A pretty picture, truly, of this dignified and intelligent body! Public plunderers, forsooth! as though a large portion of this Convention were seeking to filch money from the pockets of the people, to enrich themselves!

Now, Mr. President, allow me to say, here, once for all, (and I think I may say the same for nineteen-twentieths of the members here,) that I stand not upon this floor to represent the interests of any corporation whatever, further than may be consistent with a proper sense of duty to the great body of the people. I come not here to advocate the interests of any corporate body, whether it be the Madison Railroad Company—the White Water Canal—the Bellefontaine Road—or the State Bank of Indiana. I hold not a dollar of stock in any corporation, and never expect to—and what little business transactions I have had with the Madison Railroad, have been of a character not to impress me favorably with the management of its affairs. Considering the relation I sustain to the official head of that Company, I would be the last man in the world, to whom they would look for any particular favor—the last man they would expect to find ministering to their cupidity—ah, sir, the very last who would seek to plunder the public for their particular benefit.

Had I been disposed, as a member of this body, to consult the interests and reflect the wishes of that particular Company, I should have voted very differently from what I did on Saturday last, upon the proposition to tie up the hands of all future legislatures, as to the power of the State to borrow money, or otherwise incur a debt. I say I should have voted very differently upon that measure, which I consider as virtually effecting that, which the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company have been vainly seeking to accomplish for the last three or four years. By this measure you have effectually precluded the State from redeeming this important work from the Company, by refunding the amount expended by them on the Road, together with the interest, after deducting the net profits arising therefrom, according to the provisions of the act of 1842, under which the surrender was made. But the responsibility of the measure rests with the majority of this body, and not with me, or my respected colleague on my left (Mr. Dunn). Now, sir, I am as much opposed as any gentleman upon this floor, to the State borrowing money in future, to invest in new works of internal improvement; but I should like to reserve the power, if necessary, to take care of that which we have, in the construction of which vast amounts have been expended by the State. And above all, I am utterly opposed to the State relinquishing her right of redemption in this important thoroughfare, the Madison Railroad, which I regard as one of the most profitable investments in the whole country—and which must continue to increase in importance, as a source of profit, as those various lines of railroad now in process of completion shall be brought into communication with it.

And here permit me to remark, as I pass along, that my votes upon the question pending on Saturday, are not to be construed, as some gentlemen have construed me, as favoring an exclusive State Bank system. No, sir; for I profess to be as decidedly in favor of free banking as any gentleman here, and it will be found so, whenever the question properly comes up before us. It is true, sir, I am not opposed to the continuance of the present State Bank system, taken in connexion with other systems of banking that may be adopted. It has worked well hitherto, and doubtless would continue to work well, as far as it goes; but then it does not and cannot afford sufficient facilities to answer the wants of the community. But if I must choose between the present State Bank, and a system of free banking properly guarded and restricted, so as at all times to secure the billholder, I will be found going for the latter. Yes, sir, as the gentleman from Jay remarked on Saturday, in regard to the State Bank, so say I in regard to the other, that I will be found voting nine hundred and ninety-nine times in favor of free banking and not once in favor of the present close monopoly.

But, says this very honorable correspondent of the Jeffersonian, "it's a kind of Kilkenny cat fight, between the friends of these corporations, as to who shall do the most plundering." Now I suppose, sir, that my honorable friend from Franklin over the way (Mr. Shoup,) who I believe is a stockholder and director in the White Water Canal, will feel very much complimented indeed by the notice he has received at the hands of this very distinguished letter-writer. But I put it to the Convention in all seriousness, whether the votes of that gentleman have indicated a disposition to favor the interests of that or any other corporation?—whether he has manifested a desire to plunder the public for his own pecuniary benefit, and those with whom he may be associated? No, sir; but, on the contrary, his votes and his speeches upon this floor indicate anything else but a desire to favor the interests of public or private corporations, however he may be identified with them. And here, too, is my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) who usually sits upon my right, but not now in his seat. He has the honor, I believe, to be the President of the White Water Canal; and doubtless he, too, will feel greatly complimented by this polite notice through the columns of the Jeffersonian—a paper that circulates extensively among his immediate constituents. But let any man look into the honest face of John Newman, and tell me whether he believes that he could be guilty of plundering the public, and trampling upon the rights of the people for the benefit of a soulless corporation, although he may be the President and a large stockholder in it. Sir, it is an unmitigated calumny, to which no honorable man can give credit for a moment; and I hurl it back with indignation into the very face of the calumniator, whoever and wherever he may be—there let it stick until it blisters.

But as to the Bellefontaine Road, I am at a loss to know who is pointed at as being its pleaders upon this floor. I confess I have not heard the interests of that Road alluded to in debate, unless it may have been by the gentleman from Hancock, and then only incidentally. But allow me to read you another extract from this precious document. He says:

"A war of words took place on Monday between Mr. Rariden and Mr. Read of Monroe, in which Mr. Rariden displayed his usual ungentlemanly, uncourteous course of conduct. A man of his age should set an upright and moral precedent to the younger members of the Convention, instead of which, he has become a loathing to all honorable men."

Now, this, I presume, will be news to the greater portion of this body, and especially so to the gentleman from Wayne, himself, who I regret to see is out of his seat at present. But as the question presented involves only a mere matter of opinion, I shall not take up your time in controverting it. I may remark, however, that it is very evident that the good people of Wayne County, who doubtless know that gentleman far better than does this correspondent, entertain a very different opinion of him, or they never would have sent him here to aid in framing the organic law of the State. But not to detain you longer here, let me call your attention for a moment to the most important part of this correspondence—at least of the greatest importance to me personally. The writer continues to say—

"There is another gentleman in the Convention who studies nothing else—who has not an idea above party triumph, and making capital for the whig party. He has not made a speech yet, but what he has endeavored to use some grog-shop witticism, at the expense of the democratic party. I refer to Mr. Gregg of Jefferson."

Now, Mr. President, this matter appears to be assuming somewhat of a personal character; and were I to treat it as it perhaps deserves to be treated, I would pass it over with silent contempt. But I profess to have some regard for public opinion, and do not like to be misrepresented before that high tribunal; and I know of no better way of settling this matter right than to meet it just here upon this floor. And I may fearlessly appeal to every member of this body who has heard me, for the truth of what I say, when I declare most solemnly that since the first speech I had the honor to deliver in this Convention, I have not alluded directly or indirectly to party or party politics, in any remarks whatever, made by me on this floor—nor am I aware of having given a single vote that could be construed into that of a party character. The truth is, sir, since I have been a member of this Convention, I have uniformly eschewed party politics, as I would a moral pestilence; for I would as soon think of carrying party feelings into a Methodist class-meeting, were I worthy to be a member of that body, as into the grave deliberations of this assembly. I therefore repel the imputation as unjust—as wholly unwarranted by anything which may have fallen from me in debate. It is true, sir, that in the first speech I had the honor to deliver here, and which you will remember was made upon my proposition to dispense with the services of a Stenographer, I did allude to the spirit of party. I remarked on that occasion that I sincerely regretted that it had been introduced here in the organization of this body—but I indulged the hope that the effervescence of party would soon subside, and we should hear no more of it. But I alluded to the matter on that occasion in such terms as I trust gave no offense to any one—unless it may have been the gentleman from Allen, on my right, (Mr. Borden,) who, I fear, was mortally offended at me, as he has not spoken to me since. And here I desire to do an act of justice towards that gentleman, which perhaps I should have done long ago. I desire, sir, publicly to crave his pardon for whatever I may have said on that occasion that was to him personally offensive.

Mr. BORDEN interposed. As the gentleman from Jefferson had alluded to him personally, he desired to know whether he intended to implicate him in any way with the authorship of the communication referred to?

Mr. GREGG. By no means, sir. I believe the gentleman from Allen is too high-minded and honorable to be guilty of the like. And allow me to assure the gentleman, in all seriousness, that I entertain for him none but the kindest feelings—and hope he will forgive the hasty and inconsiderate remarks called forth at the time by what I regarded as an unwarranted interruption on his part.

But, Mr. President, as this is a question of peculiar delicacy to me, personally, I will not longer trespass upon the time of the Convention. I hope, however, I have said enough to place myself and my accuser in a proper light before the readers of the Jeffersonian, should Mr. Elder, the worthy editor of that journal, do me the favor to copy my remarks. More than this I desire not to say.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section exempting a reasonable amount of property from forced sale on execution.

The pending question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) to insert after the word "property" the words "not less than five hundred dollars in value,"

Mr. WALPOLE. Mr. President: I desire to submit a few remarks upon the pending question before the final vote shall be given.

The section now under consideration is as follows:

"The privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale, for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted."

I have observed that there is no gentleman who has addressed the Convention upon this subject, but what has acknowledged the right and justice of this section—excepting the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen)—and desires to see it engrafted in the new Constitution, while many would be glad to go much further.

The gentleman from Posey acknowledges the justice of the provision, but prefers that the whole matter should be left to the Legislature.

Sir, I like boldness and frankness in public action. I admire the bold, honest man, who, when he admits the right of a course of conduct, unflinchingly pursues it. It is clearly our duty to settle this important matter in the Constitution, and not leave it, as heretofore, an open matter for legislation. A few days since the Convention refused to submit to the people of Indiana the question whether or not the State should be authorized to borrow money. Those delegates professed that they could not trust the Legislature, nor yet the people, with so important a matter; but the great and vitally important subject of Homestead Exemption, that can safely be left with the Legislature!

Mr. President, gentlemen who have been connected with the legislative department, or at all observant of the past legislation of the State, are aware that there are many Constitutional injunctions and requirements in the instrument which now governs us, which have never been complied with or heeded at all.

I will, in proof of this, refer to the first section of the ninth article of the old Constitution.

SECTION 1. Knowledge and learning, generally diffused through a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, and spreading the opportunities and advantages of education through the various parts of the country, being highly conducive to this end, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, to provide by law for the improvement of such lands as are, or hereafter may be, granted by the United States to this State, for the use of schools, and to apply any funds which may be raised from such lands, or from any other quarter, to the accomplishment of the grand object for which they are or may be intended: But no lands granted for the use of schools or seminaries of learning shall be sold, by authority of this State, prior to the year eighteen hundred and twenty; and the moneys which may be raised out of the sale of any such lands, or otherwise obtained for the purposes aforesaid, shall be and remain a fund for the exclusive purpose of promoting the interest of literature and the sciences, and for the support of seminaries and public schools. The General Assembly shall, from time to time, pass such laws as shall be calculated to encourage intellectual, scientific, and agricultural improvements, by allowing rewards and immunities for the promotion and improvement of arts, sciences, commerce, manufactures, and natural history; and to countenance and encourage the principles of humanity, honesty, industry, and morality.

Although these provisions were solemnly incorporated in the Constitution in 1816, the Legislature, to this day, has never attempted to comply with the requirements of this section. Nor is this all: in the second section of the same article we find the following provision:

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as circumstances will permit, to provide by law for a general system of education, ascending in a regular gradation from township school to a State university, wherein tuition shall be gratis, and equally open to all.

And now, let me ask of those gentlemen who so strenuously urge this Convention to follow the example of the first, and to leave to the Legislature the settlement of the question of Homestead Exemption, if the examples of the past will warrant such action? For thirty-four years the legislative department has virtually refused to carry out the solemn and direct requirements of Constitutional law, and shall we trust that department with still more important questions—still more vital interests of the people of Indiana for the next thirty-four, or the next one hundred years? (Cries of "no, no.")

But, sir, I have not done yet. There is still another section, more binding in its requirements than those I have quoted, and which the Legislature has neither obeyed or noticed.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as circumstances will permit, to form a penal code, founded on the principles of reformation, and not of vindictive justice: And, also, to provide one or more farms, to be an asylum for those persons who, by reason of age, infirmity, or other misfortunes, may have a claim upon the aid and beneficence of society, on such principles that such persons may therein find employment and every reasonable comfort, and lose, by their usefulness, the degrading sense of dependence.

The humane and noble spirited framers of the old Constitution made, in this section, a provision which is a lasting monument to their honor. Incalculable would be the amount of good done to the aged, the infirm, and the otherwise unfortunate among the people, had this beneficent provision been carried out by the department upon which compliance was imposed! Our fathers, when they framed this instrument intended to relieve the truly unfortunate by employing them on the public farms, and for the most considerate reasons—that they might "lose, by their usefulness, the degrading sense of their dependence."

If there was time, Mr. President, I might refer to other sections in the old Constitution which have been entirely neglected by the Legislatures upon whom was enjoined the duty of enforcing their provisions; but have I not cited enough to prove that for thirty-four years, for the whole life of the State, the Legislature has been derelict in the performance of the most solemn duties! (Several voices—"Consent, consent.") Then how can it be seriously proposed to commit the dearest and the nearest interests of the masses to such unworthy keeping for the future? The Legislature will as surely neglect to carry out the provisions of a free Homestead section as they refused to obey the requirements of the first, second, and fourth sections of the ninth article of the old Constitution.

But the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) professes friendship for the principle of a Homestead Exemption. He says he is in favor of the exemption of a reasonable amount of property from sale or execution, but he desires to see the whole matter left to the action of future Legislatures. Sir, I hold that the only manly course with regard to this question, is to walk boldly up to its settlement in the new Constitution. The simple question that addresses itself to every delegate in this Convention is, "Is the principle of Homestead Exemption a true one—is it right?"

The legislation upon the subject has been unstable and changeful. One Legislature, I remember, exempted fifty dollars worth of property; another increased the amount to one hundred and fifty dollars. To-day one amount is exempted, and to-morrow another; and there is no certainty—nothing that either the debtor or creditor can rely upon. This instability in legislation with regard to the homestead, grows out of the want of a provision fixed in the organic law of the State. Bills, increasing or decreasing the amount exempt from execution, are passed or "got through" the Legislature according to the desire of some delegation who are operated upon by local and sectional causes, to effect a change in the exemption laws.

I have seen instances where men came up to the Legislature as the representatives of particular interests, by which they were stimulated to effect a change in the exemption laws—sometimes to get them repealed; and at the next session the same, or a similar law would be re-enacted.

Mr. President, in place of this uncertainty and fluctuation, I wish to see stability and fixedness; and I think it must be evident to every reflecting mind—to every man who has attentively observed the course of past legislation upon the subject—that this stability can only be obtained by a provision in the fundamental law.

Five hundred dollars has been named as a proper amount of property to be exempt from seizure or sale for any debt hereafter contracted. This appears to be every way reasonable; and if the support of a majority of delegates can be concentrated on this proposition, I should cheerfully vote for it.

In seventeen States in this Union the principle of homestead exemption has been fully recognized and incorporated in their Constitutions. But, sir, in 1850, the delegates chosen by the people of Indiana to seats in this Convention, on account of their firmness, their honesty, and their independence of character, are afraid—yes, sir, many of them are afraid to meet the responsibility of placing a homestead exemption section in the new Constitution! They desire to free themselves of a responsibility they do not feel prepared to take, by referring the whole matter to future Legislatures. Mr. President, you and I know too much of the character of legislation—of the influences that operate in these halls—to place much confidence in the action of that department upon this subject. We know that too many representatives are weak and vascillating, and that if this great measure is left to their settlement, there will be no stability—nothing upon which the people can depend as a fixed and unchangeable law, by which they may guide their business transactions one with another. If, in this Convention of men, selected for the qualities of independence, boldness, and firmness, men are found to be wavering and fearful of taking responsibilities, what is to be expected from the Legislature? If it is really the fact, that time-serving politicians have succeeded in being elected to this Convention of Delegates, chosen by the people because they were supposed to possess precisely the opposite qualities of character, what counsels may we expect to prevail in the General Assembly?

When a delegate here says that he is in favor of homestead exemption, and yet is afraid to take upon himself the responsibility of making his recorded votes correspond with his open professions, I must be allowed to say, without intending to impugn motives, that I think he is sailing under false colors.

The original section, as reported from the committee, is that

There is a proposition providing that property to the value of not less than five hundred dollars shall be exempted. Now, I desire to see just such a proposition—definite and certain as it is—fixed in the new Constitution. If you leave this matter open, what will the Legislature do? Why, sir, they will continue to exempt an amount of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, which is the sum of property now freed from seizure or sale. The next Legislature might possibly increase the amount; but all is uncertain.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to every proposition which would leave this an open matter; and I am decidedly in favor of fixing, not only the principle, but the amount, in the fundamental law of the land. And I call upon every true friend of freehold exemption to stand by the proposition to fix the matter definitely here. If we fail to do this, we shall disappoint the people, who, having lost all confidence in legislative action upon the matter, are looking with hope and anxiety to the result of the deliberations of a body whose constituent parts they have called together with express reference to the settlement of those questions which the General Assembly, either for the want of power or the lack of will, are incapable of settling.

I think, sir, that every one must be satisfied that the arguments of gentlemen, who oppose this proposition on the ground that it should be left to legislation, are without weight and undeserving of the least influence. I have shown clearly that past Legislatures have been recreant to the duties solemnly imposed upon them by the old Constitution; and it is a fair and legitimate inference that future Legislatures will follow their example, and make no adequate provision for freehold exemption.

We clearly have the right to exempt five hundred dollars worth of property in the Constitution, and our opponents should meet us on half way ground, and support a proposition to declare that amount free from seizure or sale; the provision to act prospectively.

Sir, there is but one interest in community which is operating against the beneficent principles of the proposition now in debate, and that is the mercantile, or rather, to speak more generally, and at the same time more accurately, the commercial interest. Go out through every portion of this broad State, and the laboring population—the producing masses of the country—and among them you will hear no dissenting voice to the principle of a freehold exemption. It is the trading and speculating men—it is the non-producing class who stand between the producer and the consumer, and extract the living and wealth from both, who oppose this wise and humane proposition—a provision which is as politic for the State—which contributes as much to its stability and prosperity, as it does to the security and happiness of the citizen. I, for one, do not want to see the trading and speculating class rule the councils and shape the action of this Convention.

We owe it to the State—to the people in the aggregate no less than to the individual citizen—to adopt such a provision as I have advocated. It is to the interest of the State—it is the true policy of every statesman—to make the citizens of Indiana feel an interest in this country—to cultivate an attachment for the very soil. He should be made to feel that the law spreads over his home a shield and protection, and that whatever storms of adversity overtake him—whatever misfortunes, in an evil hour, may blacken over his pathway—one spot of earth shall be secure to him, or the amount which will command a comfortable home. He should be made to feel, that, in his hour of sickness or calamity, there is a country that recognizes his right to the comforts of life—a law that preserves him and his family from absolute suffering.

But, instead of pursuing a policy like this, shall we listen to gentlemen, who, in syren tones, would advise us to leave the whole question to the Legislature—shall we thus yield to the commercial spirit, and deny the masses of the country the protection of wholesome and wise laws?

The proposition of the chairman of the committee (Mr. Owen) is without virtue. It proposes to leave the whole matter open; and it is clear that the Legislature will never carry out any mere constitutional recommendations.

I sincerely hope that the pending amendment will be adopted, and that property to the amount of five hundred dollars may be exempted from seizure or sale for any debt or obligation hereafter contracted. And I trust this will be done, not by requiring the Legislature to carry out a recommendation to that effect, but by fixing the principle definitely in the new Constitution.

Mr. PETTIT. I have risen, sir, to assign a reason for not discussing this question, and not for the purpose of addressing the Convention.

I had designed speaking upon the question now in debate, not for the purpose of knocking down the "nine pins" set up by some gentlemen, but thoroughly to investigate this question of Homestead Exemption. But the time to which each speaker is limited by the resolution which a numerical majority has seen fit to adopt, will not allow me to express the views I entertain. This is a subject which cannot be grasped and presented in a moment's time; the truth of the matter lies not upon the surface.

But I would make no distinction between real and personal property, but would exempt from seizure and sale either, or both.

Sir, I had desired to contrast the policy of other nations who had adopted the principle of a freehold exemption with those who have not; but I have not time for such a comparison. I had desired to go farther back than the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) took us; farther than the history of Rome, who, by neglecting this principle, has passed from national existence; I had desired to go back to the Mosaic system, which secured the rights of the individual to a freehold exemption in a better manner than has been done by any nation before or since. The beneficent effects of the Mosaic policy were more lasting than the policy of exemption adopted by any other country in the world. I could have wished to cite chapter and verse in which this policy is quite fully described, as well as the manner in which all the lands were divided out among the children of Israel, and then to show that so long as that policy was adhered to, so long no foreign power was able to prevail against them. But when that policy was abandoned, when the people, or a great portion of them withdrew themselves from public affairs, took no interest in the general welfare because they had no spot of earth which was inalienably their own. So soon as they could say they had no country and no home, so soon their institutions crumbled and sank to naught.

Then, sir, we have the most instructive lesson from the history of Sparta, where the land and property were divided up into thirty-nine thousand parts, and distributed among the people. And, sir, what indomitable energy, what rare vigor characterized the Spartan of that age. The Spartan name became a synonym for "a lover of his country," and the nation was never vanquished until the system of inalienable homes was abolished.

From four hundred and eighty-four years before Christ until the battle of Leuctra, never were the arms of Sparta reversed, but onward and upward was her career among the nations.

But, sir, I am forgetting that I had only risen to give the reason why I could not address the Convention in support of my views upon the pending question. It is a subject in which the people of my portion of the State feel a deep interest, and a question which my constituents expected I should discuss.

But it is forbidden that this most important question should be liberally investigated, and I yield to the rule of the majority.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, this question of Homestead Exemption has been ably, as well as fully discussed, by other gentlemen, and I should not now ask the attention of the Convention, were it not that I desire to allude to a different branch of the subject from that which has already been reviewed.

The arguments of gentlemen who have sustained this measure on moral grounds, I heartily endorse, but I will not discuss that feature of the subject. I wish to call attention to another topic which has not yet been alluded to.

There are two questions involved in this proposition to exempt a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale for any debts hereafter contracted.

And first, is the measure expedient and proper in itself?

In the second place, if expedient and proper in itself, should it be ingrafted in the new Constitution?

Now, sir, I affirm that the measure of freehold exemption is right and proper, and that it is eminently good policy to ingraft a provision embracing that principle in the organic law of the State. Every argument, when properly weighed, will be found upon that side of the question.

I will not stop to speak of the propriety of giving men an interest in the country of their residence. If the public mind is fully settled upon any proposition, it is upon that. It makes no difference, sir, who or what party starts the proposition and advocates its adoption, the simple question is, is it right? for if it be right the people will surely endorse it.

I am decidedly in favor of this measure; not because it is ultra, not because it is radical or an agrarian measure, but because it is a conservative and an anti-radical measure. Our true policy, sir, is to ascertain what is the will of the people, and if it has progressed to a certain point, and demand a corresponding advancement in legislation, or in fundamental law, grant to that public opinion, when clearly and fairly expressed, what it demands, and there stop.

Mr. President, this is the policy which will forever prevent revolutions, and that is an object which all true statesmen should have in view.

I am decidedly in favor of the proposition for Homestead Exemption, because I am convinced that it will bring about a wholesome and a salutary change in the credit system. I shall support it on the ground that it is a practical measure, not as a theory or a mere abstraction.

Let me here remark, that it is my belief that every proposition which will have the effect to put the question of debt upon a moral basis, which will tend to assimilate the question of debt with moral obligations, and thus bring about a healthy state of public opinion in this regard, should be adopted.

I recollect reading during the last summer a series of essays from the pen of an able gentleman, a citizen of Southern Indiana—the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) perhaps—and that as an abstract proposition the payment of debts ought to be placed among the moral obligations without the aid of legal remedy, although the time has not yet arrived for adopting it in practice, and may not arrive for a long period, perhaps never; but the proposition will aid to place the obligation of paying debts on higher ground, and I consider the arguments of those essays unanswerable. And I support this proposition because I believe it will bring about a healthy moral feeling in the community with regard to debt, and check the spirit of improvidence more than any other legal restraints upon the credit system can ever do.

In illustration of the position I occupy, and of the views I entertain, I beg leave to read an article from the National Intelligencer, which is quite to the point:

"AN UNUSUAL SIGHT.—We yesterday saw in one of the Harrisburg papers a notice of an intended application for the benefit of the insolent laws. A few years ago, preceding every term of an "Insolvent Court," long columns of names were paraded in the newspapers of intended applications for the benefit of the law. We now rarely hear of such an application, and we venture the assertion that not half so much money is lost from bad debts as was lost before the law exempting from execution three hundred dollars' worth of property was passed. The hundreds of thousands of dollars formerly spent in legally collecting small debts are now saved to the poor, who had the tax to bear. They are, therefore, to the extent of this saving, the better able to buy for cash."

There, sir, is a practical argument stronger and better than any other that can be made in favor of homestead exemption—it is the argument of experience. And, sir, such results will certainly follow wherever a provision of the kind now under consideration is adopted.

The truth is, that in Indiana we are altogether too much in debt; we are indebted beyond our means to pay without every year anticipating the resources of the next. It is necessary to put a check upon this debt-contracting system. It is a statistical fact that the whole capital invested in farming operations does not yield an interest over three or four per cent. per annum, while our interest laws allow the taking of six per cent. interest. Merchants must have ten or fifteen per cent. profit upon their goods; first the profits of the manufacturer, then of the wholesale dealer in New York, and then of the merchants here. What interest of the State, and especially what people engaged in agricultural pursuits, will be able to stand up against such odds? In view of such facts, I look upon the question in debate as eminently a practical one, and the proposed provision as a most expedient one.

The next question is, should such a provision be ingrafted in the new Constitution? I have but one general principle to guide me with regard to Constitutional reforms, and it is this: if there be a measure—whether of legislative character or otherwise—which time has shown to be important, and experience has proven politic and expedient, place that measure in the organic law, where it may forever remain, beyond the reach of fluctuating legislation. If left to the Legislature a homestead exemption may be placed on the Statute Book this year, and repealed the next; all will be unfixed and uncertain. If gentlemen admit that this measure is a desirable one for the good of the people of Indiana, it is equally desirable that it should be fixed in the Constitution.

Mr. President, we are not contending for something which is new and untried; we are not asking of this Convention to step forward and occupy new and unbroken ground. It has been tested elsewhere, and the responses given are similar to the one I have just read.

And, sir, a measure of this kind is peculiarly suitable to Indiana, for, of all countries, an agricultural one is least able to sustain a system of credit, as I have already remarked. The system is too expensive for it. The history of the world, from the earliest ages of civilization to the present time, proves, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that while communities peculiarly agricultural have not advanced in wealth, even while the simple habits of the greater number enabled them to procure most articles of consumption without going beyond their own boundaries, those communities in which manufactures and commerce constituted the principal interest, have rapidly accumulated in wealth. Tyre and Carthage on the one hand, Rome, in her early ages, and Greece on the other, are ancient witnesses; England and Poland are modern witnesses of the truth of the position. Our own country furnishes evidence also, to the same effect. And it is manifest upon a little reflection that it could not be otherwise. More than three-fourths of all articles consumed in the world are agricultural products, and the greater part of mankind are employed in furnishing them. In the present condition of things—certainly for several years past, with an occasional and temporary exception—the net value of agricultural productions, in proportion to their cost, has been less than the price of manufactured articles to the prime cost.

And so it will continue to be, although the ratio is constantly altering.

It is demonstrable that in order to be in a truly flourishing condition, we must manufacture as well as plant. This certain truth then, that the cost of agricultural products treads so close on price, demonstrates why an agricultural community cannot afford to run in debt. The merchant or manufacturer may now well use his credit at bank for six months, which will cost him, say three or three and a half per cent. for his operation or adventure. But the farmer cannot stand up under a credit. The plain truth is, that it is too expensive, and the reasons may be briefly summed up thus:

1st. The principal articles consumed by our farmers, over and above the products of the farm, are merchandise brought to the neighborhood by the merchant.

This merchant purchases his goods chiefly on a credit, and this credit, if for six months, costs, 1st, interest, three per cent., 2d for credit, from five to ten per cent. on the average, say eight per cent. The farmer who gets credit is taxed by this merchant, say eight per cent. besides interest, and this is approximatively what the present vicious system of credit costs. Many debts, it will be said, are lost; but they are not lost, for honest and solvent men have to pay them, under this same title of price of credit.

2dly. A community under a cash system, or that which approximates to it, will seldom buy more than their means will warrant; but under our present system they go beyond it, and the consequence is that the resources of future years are mortgaged in advance for the necessities of the present time.

Our whole system of credit is doomed to fall, and I have no doubt that time will ultimately demolish the whole system, and the present system of banking with it.

Let a healthier system be adopted, and you will see fewer farms abandoned half cleared—fewer fluctuations in value, and a more complete sympathy between supply and demand. But it is urged that credit is useful to individuals, and has helped to improve and embellish the whole western country. This I shall not deny, and all that I desire is that it may be regulated; all that I wish to remedy now is its abuse.

The amendment now under consideration tends to this end, and if there were no other reasons for supporting it—as indeed there are many others—this alone would be sufficient to convince me. It may be regarded as first in a system of measures calculated to bring about a healthier state of credit, and tending to consolidate society, and encouraging honesty and fair dealing. I will sustain every measure which I deem conservative, and as I deem this measure conservative, and not agrarian nor radical, I am bound to support it. The question, what is conservative and what is not, must receive different solutions, and be determined by different standards, in social and political questions. In political questions, when political changes are demanded, too great caution cannot be used, as it is better to continue for a time under the present condition of things, however defective, than to change too suddenly even for a better.

But in social questions, when the political structure is not sought to be changed, we must keep up with the wants and advancing views of mankind and need not lag behind.

But this position is in all its bearings evidently conservative, and I therefore, in addition to the other reasons, gladly support it.

[Mr. WALLACE'S remarks are unavoidably deferred; they will be published hereafter.]

Mr. OWEN. I have a few remarks to submit upon this question. I had made, in my mind, the same division of the subject as that adopted by the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe). First, as to the right or wrong of the abstract principle; and secondly, as to the policy of ingrafting it, in detail, on the Constitution.

I voted against the proposition of my friend from Huntington, (Mr. Murray),—and for that gentleman I have the highest respect—not certainly, because I was opposed to the principle of a homestead exemption. I voted against it for a single reason, and that is, because, according to the best opinion I have been able to form a majority of the people, not only in my county, but throughout the State of Indiana, are not, at this moment, prepared for the incorporation into the Constitution of the details of any homestead exemption.

favor of no homestead exemption which does not extend to personal as well as real property. In regard to that, I take the same position as upon the subject of the rights to property of married women; that was, that as we have already secured to them the income derived from their real estate, we should proceed a step further and secure to them, also, their personal property. I am satisfied, also, that a homestead is of little avail if it can be mortgaged, or sold, even with an incumbered title without the signature of the wife.

That period of my life is past, Mr. President, the period of early youth, when I deemed that whatever is right in the abstract, ought at once to become law, without reverence to the progress, say even of prejudiced public opinion. Experience has taught me that it is not enough that a reform be just in itself; it must not too far outrun the popular sentiment of the times. Laws framed far in advance of the age lose their attractive force over mankind.

The argument of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) is a forcible one, when he says, that if the principle be clearly a proper one, we ought not to leave it to a Legislature, which has been remiss in regard to other important reforms. He quotes, as one of these, in the ninth article of our present Constitution, the provision that the General Assembly shall provide one or more farms, as an asylum of the aged poor. That is a very definite proposition; as definite as the section reported by the gentleman from Huntington (Mr. Murray); and if the Legislature, for more than thirty years, have failed to carry out the one, what certainty is there, if public opinion do not urge them, that they will put in force the other?

Mr. WALPOLE (interrupting). The distinction is, that is a public and this is a mere private right.

Mr. OWEN (resuming). That is not the question, and does not weaken the argument. The provision, in either case, is intended for the benefit of a certain portion of the citizens of the State. If the reform, in regard to a homestead exemption, be in advance of public opinion, it is quite as likely to be neglected by the Legislature, as the providing of farms for the aged poor.

On the abstract question of the homestead, my colleague and myself differ. This difference was debated by us during the canvass; he condemning the principle, I supporting it. I believed then, as now, that the homestead provision lies in the path of our future progress. I go even further than this. I believe that in that path of progress, albeit at some distance, lies another reform, more radical yet; the abolition of all compulsory process for the collection of debt. [Cries of "consent."] Let not gentlemen imagine that I am about to propose the insertion of any such principle as a Constitutional provision. I know too well the point

There are various questions connected with the details of this principle, such as whether the exemption shall extend to personal as well as to real property? to what extent the homestead shall be inalienable? and others. I am in which public opinion has yet reached. That will be matter for our children, perhaps for our grand-children, to consider. I but express my opinion—for in regard to such matters I have nothing to conceal—that, some day or other, all compulsory process to collect debts will be abolished; I say, not all suits to determine debts, still less all credits, only all compulsory process. But that is in the future, and for the future, and we need not discuss it now.

Why do I believe that this homestead exemption, and similar reforms fraught with leniency to the debtor, lie in our future path? It is the lesson taught by history. Go back to the earlier provisions for the enforcement of debt, and you will find them severe almost in proportion to their antiquity.

Take, for example, the laws of the twelve tables. By these laws the death penalty was the punishment of insolvency. To the creditor was given the power of life and death over the debtor; and if the author of the "Decline and Fall" may be trusted, that power did not cease even with life, but authorized the partition, among those to whom the dead man had remained indebted, of his mangled remains. I read from what has been called "the luminous page" of Gibbon:

"After the judicial proof or confession of the debt, thirty days of grace were allowed, before a Roman was delivered into the power of his fellow-citizen. In this private prison, twelve ounces of rice was his daily food; he might be bound with a chain of fifteen pounds weight; and his misery was thrice exposed to the market place, to solicit the compassion of his friends and countrymen. At the expiration of sixty days the debt was discharged by the loss of liberty or life. The insolvent debtor was either put to death, or sold in foreign bondage beyond the Tiber; but if several creditors were alike obstinate and unrelenting, they might legally dismember his body and satiate their revenge by the horrid partition."

I pass now to the ancient Greeks, and I find among them, previously to the days of Solon, the law, that a debtor might be condemned by his creditor, to slavery. It was there customary, to pledge the person for the re-payment of debt; and the moment the condition was broken, the law allowed the creditor, without further process or delay, to seize the debtor's body, and at his option, consign him to domestic slavery, or sell him into foreign bondage. The milder laws of Solon, manumitted many of the peasantry of Attica, who, like the peons of Mexico, had thus sacrificed their liberty for debt.

In ancient Egypt, no man was permitted to borrow, without first pledging to the creditor, the embalmed body of one of his forefathers; a failure to redeem which was reckoned as infamy, worse than death. The whole sepulchre of the debtor was placed in the creditor's power. The debtor if unable or unwilling to pay his debts, was himself deprived of burial, and whilst he lived, he was not permitted to bury any person descended from him. When we call to mind the importance attached to the rites of sepulture among a people who arraigned the dead ere they permitted their consignment to the tomb, and refused burial to him whom the public accuser convicted of a vicious life, we shall conclude, that Egypt was hardly second to Rome in her severities to the insolvent debtor.

A century and a half ago, there was passed, in England, during the reign of Queen Ann, a statute making fraudulent insolvency a capital offense. But this law was short-lived. Its severity caused its repeal.

What has been the progress among ourselves? Is not the principle of imprisonment for debt dropping out of one Constitution after another? Have we not ourselves abolished it, in a section recently passed, in every case but that of fraud?

No man can look around him without perceiving, that the tendency of the age is towards greater and greater lenity to the debtor. Did we not hear, from one of our own members but yesterday, an eloquent eulogy on a departed patriot, the lamented Johnson, and was it not enumerated, and justly enumerated, among the noblest acts of his life—far worthier of record than his achievements, glorious as they were, on the battle-field—that he had been an early and a persevering advocate of the abolition of the imprisonment for debt.

But this is a digression. My colleague (Mr. Hovey) speaking on this subject, asks: "Can it be possible that this Convention will sanction legal swindling?" An intimation, as I understood it, that this homestead exemption principle is nothing better.

Mr. HOVEY (interrupting). I stated the case of two friends, one having five hundred dollars and lending it to the other, upon his promise to repay it at a certain time; and at the time set when the borrower is applied to for the money, he replies that the law exempts him, and refuses to pay. Such a case, I say, amounts to legal swindling.

Mr. OWEN. If that argument has any force, it amounts to this: That if we pass a homestead exemption law securing to the owner five hundred dollars worth of property, real or personal, as permanently his own, that exemption is a law permitting legal swindling. Now I ask the gentleman whether our law, as it now stands, which exempts, in the use of every householder, one hundred and twenty-five dollars' worth of property, is not just as much a law permitting legal swindling as the proposed homestead of five hundred dollars would be? I am sure his good sense must convince him that there is no difference whatever in principle—a mere unimportant difference in amount of exemption only—between these two cases. A man may act the rascal under any law.

If I am not mistaken, the gentleman stated also, that he had little or nothing to say to those who were opposed to the credit system. In one sense, I am not opposed to the credit system. So long as credit is given by one man to another, because he believes that he is honest, and that he will pay without the coercion of law, so long I believe the credit system to be wholesome and good. But when credit is given with a preconceived intention on the part of the creditor to coerce payment by law, in that case I hold the effect of the system to be bad and unwholesome. In such cases I think that credit ought not to be given; and that, when given, it does no good to society, neither to him who gives, nor to him who receives it.

And I believe, sir, it has also been said to-day that honor and honesty are no proper foundations for credit; that the only true foundation for credit is property. Whither does such a doctrine lead? Inevitably to this, that the upright poor man, with no security to offer but a bond that has never been broken, should be denied credit; while his rich neighbor a swindler, and scoundrel, though he be, ought to have it, because he possesses the legitimate foundation of credit, property. I think that credit is better based upon honesty than upon fifty thousand dollars.

I will say, in conclusion, that while I felt myself constrained to say what I have said as to the amendment of the gentleman from Huntington, (Mr. Murray,) I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) which proposes to insert at the proper place the words "real or personal;" regarding these as an indication to the Legislature, that the general principle of the homestead exemption is adopted and recognized.

Mr. NILES. It was not my purpose to say anything upon this subject, under the operation of the rule limiting debate to the brief period as fixed at present; but while listening to the arguments of gentlemen this afternoon, I have found myself, in opposition to my previous intention, noting down some thoughts suggested by the remarks which I have heard. I am impelled to this course more especially by the views presented by the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Owen). I need not say that I always listen to that gentleman with great respect, both for his intelligence and his motives; but while I so much respect his opinions, and honor his motives, I am frequently compelled to differ widely from him in my ultimate action upon measures which are presented here. It was with no little regret that I heard a few moments since, from the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) that he should not attempt to offer the remarks which he had designed to submit upon this question. I believe it worthy of thorough consideration. The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) has made a strong argument in favor of the homestead exemption, and believes it to lie in the path of our future progress, but is unwilling to incorporate the principle in the Constitution, from the fear that public opinion is not ripe for the measure. Now, sir, whatever great principle I believe to be clearly sound and right in itself, and tending to improve and elevate the condition of the human race, I am ready and willing to take the responsibility of ingrafting upon the organic law, and I will trust to the intelligence and calmer thoughts of the people to meet us upon proper ground.

Much has been said during the progress of this debate, in relation to the obsolete idea of imprisonment for debt. We have by unanimous consent, interdicted it forever, and we feel no fears that the people will disapprove of our course. I could not so well have expressed, as it has been done by others, my abhorrence of that old abuse—that remnant of the age of feudal darkness—those times of error and oppression when men were treated as brutes, as mere instruments in the hand of power. We indeed have passed that day. We recognize the truth as clearly as we ever see the sun in the heavens, that it is inconsistent with the first principles of free government, with every dictate of sound reason and benevolence, that a man, because of his misfortunes, should be incarcerated in a dungeon, and compelled to pine and rot in hopeless solitude. The gentleman who sits behind me, (Mr. Thornton,) this morning, in his merited eulogium upon that worthy patriot who has so recently departed from among us, (Richard M. Johnson, of Ky.,) spoke in terms of just commendation of his earnest efforts to abolish imprisonment for debt. Sir, we honor him more, in our heart of hearts, for that single act, than for all his deeds upon the tented field. Now, sir, suppose that instead of meeting in this Hall precisely at the middle of the nineteenth century, we had filled our place upon the stage a quarter of a century ago, and had then been called to occupy these seats for the very purpose for which we are now convened, and suppose that that great measure of reform, then just beginning to agitate the public mind, had been urged upon us, should we, ought we, to have shrunk from so plain a principle of progress? Though public opinion was then just beginning to be aroused upon the subject it would none the less have been a shrinking from the performance of a duty—from an act which, in all its consequences, would have been good, unmixd with evil. With my present views at least, and seeing that measure as I do to-day, I would have gone for it as cordially and earnestly as I have voted for it now, and would have trusted the result to the enlightened judgment of the people. I would not have said, as some gentlemen who favor the principle say in regard to the homestead exemption, let us adopt some provision intimating our opinions, and tending to the prohibition of imprisonment for debt; but I would have forbidden it, in the Constitution, in so many plain unmistakable Anglo-Saxon words.

I, sir, feel equally certain in regard to the soundness of the principle of Homestead Exemption, as of non-imprisonment for debt. And my own individual views would carry me further than would, perhaps, be thought prudent by a majority of the friends of the measure. I should, indeed, be satisfied at present, with the prospective exemption of a home not less in value than five hundred dollars, as proposed in one of the amendments now before the Convention. But were the question to be decided by my individual vote, I would secure to every family a comfortable home against every process of the law, except for taxes, which must be paid, and which no one with a home could be unable to pay—against mortgages, liens, and incumbrances of every description, and that not only during the life-time of the owner, but during the life of his widow, and till the youngest of his children should have become of age. It should be not a stinted shelter, but a comfortable home, worthy of the name.

Gentlemen have talked eloquently of the protection thrown around the homes of England. It is the boast of the common law, that every man's home is his castle, within which neither the prince or his vassal, is permitted to intrude. It is a principle dear to the American heart, as life or liberty itself. It is a ground element of our civilization. Destroy the sacredness of home and the world is thrown backwards towards barbarism. Now, sir, tell me when the public interests can require that the sheriff, with his posse, should be compelled to intrude upon an American home, and drive a family from that sacred spot, thrown bankrupt upon the charities of the world, because, forsooth, the husband or the father had become a profligate or a drunkard? Give me the example and the reasons, and I will tell you in the same words, why an unfortunate debtor ought to rot in jail. The arguments for the one sustain the other, and with equal, but no greater force.

If it be said that the cases in which such protection would be necessary are few, I answer that, though comparatively few, they are often heart-rending in their character, and enough to arouse and enlist the sympathies of every benevolent man. How often does it happen that a young husband and wife, by self-sacrificing industry, secure a comfortable, though humble home; the husband and father, in a too hopeful moment, becomes involved in debts, which, had his life been spared, he might have been able to pay: but, in the inscrutable ways of Providence, he is taken from his family, and in due course of law, their little home is sold and parted among the creditors, as if it were the spoils of victory. The mother, driven from the shelter which her industry had helped to provide, with no spot on earth which she can call her home, is compelled to tear in sunder the ties of nature and part her children to distant strangers, or to support them by the unaided labor of her hands. And that too, under the laws of a civilized and christian land! Sir, such scenes are a disgrace to the legislation of the State, and a burning shame to the age in which we live.

But it is argued that it is necessary that the home be subject to be sold on execution, in order to secure credit to its owner. I grant you, sir, that, when he or his wife or children visit the neighboring town, traders and sharpers, of a certain class, may be more likely to induce them to purchase on credit, what they are not able to buy, and what they do not really need, than if the little home were beyond their reach. The fact that a judgment could be had at any moment, before a justice of the peace—that a transcript could be filed in the circuit court, becoming at once a lien on land—that at the next term of the court, a judgment upon scire facias could be obtained, execution issued, and the homestead sold, would give some assurance to a heartless creditor. But let it be remembered that economy is wealth, and that industry, integrity, and honor are the true basis of credit. Credit will exist wherever these are found, and where these are wanting it is nothing word. It is strange benevolence to the debtor, that, because he may have been unfortunate, or to his family, that, because he may have been dishonest, his and their home shall be sold by the sheriff, under the relentless process of the law. Such scenes can never be an honor to the history or legislation of any country in the world.

But, sir, if there were no great principle of benevolence and humanity involved in this measure, I would favor it for the very reasons upon which others found their opposition—because it will place a wholesome check upon hasty and indiscriminate credit—one of the vices of our time. Have gentlemen forgotten that golden rule in private economy, so often called the true philosopher's stone, turning everything into gold—the time-honored maxim—"pay as you go?" If, by adopting this measure, we help to carry that maxim into practice, however long and tedious and expensive the sitting of this Convention may be, the people will receive back a thousand fold of all it will have cost them.

That credit which is based only upon the homestead of the debtor, is worse than none. If credit and commerce can rest only on such a foundation, and can be sustained only by driving families from their homes; if such is the alternative, then I say, emphatically, let them perish. The Homestead Exemption would be a fearful check upon credit indeed! Were Baron Rothschild to come among us and locate himself in Indianapolis, to loan out his money upon bond and mortgage, that he might double, treble or quadruple his uncounted millions by usurious gains, the men whose little homes were protected would, indeed, not become the borrowers. But without such protection, they might in unguarded moments, mortgage to him their homes, and always to their injury, if not their ruin. With such protection, so many of the ardent minded and too hopeful citizens of this State could never have made loans from our odious and oppressive Sinking Fund—a Sinking fund, indeed! [applause,] sinking our fellow-citizens by scores and hundreds, into hopeless bankruptcy, and throwing them homeless upon the world. Under that beautiful, Jew-like policy of loaning money by the State to her citizens, on long times and at heavy interest, we see every year, pages of advertisements in the newspapers of this city, offering for sale the farms of the people, on mortgages to that Fund. With a system of protected homes, it is true that many of those mortgages could never have been received, but it is no less true that many a worthy citizen would have escaped a load of accumulated evils which have followed in their train.

But gentlemen say, adopt such a measure as this, and you will tempt men to resort to all manner of subterfuges to avoid the payment of their debts. Now, sir, I would ask any member upon this floor to reflect and answer me, who are the men, unless they be knaves at heart, whose property is covered over with mortgages, to shield it from executions? Who are the men who most often have been charged with covering up their property, but the very men who have been mercilessly driven from their homes, because of their misfortunes, and the necessities of whose wives and children appeal to them with a force which they are poorly able to resist? Who, but these are most often found attempting to shield what little property they have remaining, from the reach of executions issued from your courts of justice? Who but such men, are most often charged with subterfuges? And who but these, of all others upon earth, can you least condemn?

And gentlemen not only say that in this measure we strike at the foundations of the credit system, but they call hard names; they talk of radicalism and agrarianism, as if we would overturn the foundations of society. Indeed, sir! notwithstanding the courtesy which is due from one gentleman to another upon this floor, I could but feel my blood tingle in my veins, when I heard such language. Agrarianism indeed! because we would protect a home to every family and to the widow and her infant children against the relentless mission of the officers of the law! Away with such language and such reasoning. Tell us that you despise and defy the principles of benevolence and of progress, and we will give you credit for consistency at least; but do not come with professions of sympathy for the poor upon your lips. There is no other such great conservative measure now agitating the public mind. The wealthy do not need its protection, but it shall help to raise the middling classes and the poor to a condition of conscious independence and self respect. Who feels humiliated by retaining for the use of his family the hundred and twenty-five dollars worth of personal property, now exempt from execution? And what unfortunate debtor, because his family are left in comfort, shall be less likely to put forth every effort to discharge all the obligations of honor and of conscience, than if his family had been beggared and his spirits crushed? Talk of it as we may, there is no such picture on earth as the homes of the people, rude and homely though they be.

Those will love their country who love their homes. Protect them in their homes and they shall defend their country, her laws and institutions. Make home in very fact, what the common law has dimly seen that it should be, and you shall help to build up a condition of society among us; a state of external and internal peace and beauty, such as the sun has never looked upon in all his course. It is a policy not for a day, but for all time. Its benign influences will not be fully seen in your day or mine, but it shall shed its sunlight upon the homes of our children. It is in harmony with that long hoped for and better state, when every family shall sit peacefully under their own vine and fig tree, with none to molest or to make them afraid. It will go hand in hand with Christian civilization, whenever and wherever its influence is extended, and it will never be abandoned till that light goes down in darkness.

It may be thought unsuited to the place and the occasion to refer to the recollections and associations which make up the crowning felicity of life. But I respond with all my heart, to the touching and beautiful appeal of the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax). I am not ashamed to own that my feelings are enlisted no less than my understanding is convinced. I go for the measure because it is right in itself, right against all forms of sophistry, right against all appeals to prejudice and passion, and the love of gain, right against the world. The home where the ivy and the woodbine have been taught to twine by tender hands and loving hearts—where the children were born, and some of them have died—where the aged parents still remain, and whither the sons and daughters return from their distant emigrations to pay their tribute of filial homage—the home where all that is sacred in life in death and in religion centres—that home I would protect, not by unstable laws enacted to-day and repealed to-morrow, but by constitutional provisions immutable as truth and justice and enduring as the everlasting hills. [Applause.]

Mr. NAVE. It would seem, Mr. President, from what has taken place this afternoon, that almost the entire Convention is in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) securing a homestead exemption to every citizen of Indiana, of not less than five hundred dollars in value. But, sir, I rise in my place to enter my solemn protest against the proposition. I am opposed, sir, entirely, to an absolute exemption of five hundred dollars worth of property, over which the creditor shall have no control, either in his person or through a sheriff. I am not here to protect the interests of the wealthy, as it seems to be charged upon those who are opposed to this exemption. The majority of the citizens of Indiana, sir, are not worth five hundred dollars; I therefore ask if in protecting those who are worth five hundred dollars, you are not protecting the wealthy. I insist then that the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock, does not give protection to the poorer class of citizens in this State, who compose the majority of the inhabitants.

I recollect, sir, that a general bankrupt law once passed Congress, and that its passage was hailed as one of the greatest blessings that could be bestowed on the American people; and yet it proved a blighting curse to them; and the same will be the result of this celebrated homestead exemption law, of which gentlemen speak so flatteringly.

I ask gentlemen to meet me on a practical and correct proposition, to protect the poor. I am for saying to the sheriff, so far shalt thou come, and no farther; and if you give the heads of families an exemption of two hundred dollars, sir, you protect the poor. If the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock is voted down, I shall propose a substitute in the following words: "not to exceed five hundred and not less than two hundred dollars." Thus we will have a maximum and minimum to control the Legislature in their action on the subject. If you say you will exempt a man owning property worth five hundred dollars, the man worth one thousand, or two thousand dollars will come forward and say, you must protect me to the full value of my property, or you fail to carry out the principle of the homestead exemption. A gentleman not long since who was building a house worth twenty-three hundred dollars, told me that he considered if the principle of the homestead exemption was carried out, he would be protected to the full value of his property. I take the ground, sir, that until you destroy the system of credit that prevails in Indiana, you should not protect from execution for debt, except in small amounts, and for the benefit of the wives and children of intemperate and profligate husbands.

By way of enforcing their arguments gentlemen have referred to the practice that prevailed in Judea on this subject. Well, sir, the principle in operation there, was that no man needed credit. Sparta, in like manner has been referred to, where, as in the case of Judea, no system of credit prevailed, and therefore, there was no necessity of protection to the homestead. The references of gentlemen amount to nothing, and prove nothing, except the fact that they wish to secure to the wealthy citizens of Indiana an absolute protection against the payment of honest debts. I enter my decided protest against such an effort.

Mr. HOVEY said: I wish to make a few remarks in answer to the comments which have been made by gentlemen, upon the historical facts which I presented, and the views which I expressed this morning. A spectator to the debate this afternoon, would suppose that the delegates who have had the floor for the last two hours, were declaiming to some popular assembly. The tears of the widow and the orphan—the destitution of the wife, with her helpless children—the grave, with its ivy and myrtle, creeping and twining over and around it—all in short that can awaken our sensibilities, or touch the feelings of the heart, has been dragged into this discussion. Are we to be guided simply by the impulses of the heart? And shall we not listen to the dictates of reason? Have gentlemen forgotten to argue, and is declamation the most trivial and fulsome to be advanced? I thought that this deliberate body was one of argument, of thought, of reflection, one, sir, whose judgment was not to be guided by light and sophistical declamation.

I would tell my honorable colleague, (Mr. Owen,) erudite and talented as he is, that he has read history but to little purpose, if he is prepared to believe the cruel and bloody picture, which he has just portrayed to this Convention. The story of cutting the body of the debtor in pieces and dividing it among his creditors, is now regarded as a mere fiction by the best legal antiquarians. If the gentleman doubts this statement, I refer him to Kent's Commentaries, which I think will fully convince him of his error. But even for argument admit his statement is correct, does it follow because the creditor has been by law deprived of the power of the dungeon, and ceased to take an arm or a leg of his debtor, that he should also give up the whole of his debt, by the adoption of laws that might deprive him of it? Surely not. The idea of over-riding plain principles of justice by appealing to the feelings, through the arguments of the widow, the orphan, the grave, the dungeon, and even the imaginary bloody fragments of the unfortunate debtor, is to me, to say the least, a new mode of argument.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) has brought before the Convention, the fact that the ancient Jews lived under institutions giving to each a home, and argues their happiness and prosperity from that fact. Now, sir,

I think there was some higher cause than that institution, which guided that favored nation to happiness and prosperity. Yes, the same God that led their fathers through the wilderness, and the Red Sea, was around and about them for protection, until they forsook him, and then even their homesteads could not shield them from destruction.

Immediately after my conclusion this morning, the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) arose and made an attack upon the historical part of my remarks. He brought forward Arnold, an English, and Neibhur, a German historian, who pretend to have discovered in the nineteenth century, that all the ancient Roman historians were wrong in their statements in regard to the Gracchi and the agrarian laws of Rome. They, Arnold and Neibhur, (he says,) prove the Gracchi patriots, and that the Licinian law did not take the property of one class to divide amongst another.

It is not uncommon for historians, as well as writers on science and philosophy, to attempt to make the credulous believe some great new discovery of their own. Such I should feel disposed to think were the gentleman's favorite authors, as they have pretended to discover that more than one half of Roman history is fabulous. And I would not be at all surprised, sir, if these favorite authors were placed somewhat in the situation described by the very poetical, classical, and beautiful quotation made by the honorable gentleman a few days ago. It was this:

"Tickle me, Tommy, do, do, do;
You tickle me, and I'll tickle you."

I would not be surprised, sir, if Arnold was tickling Neibhur, and Neibhur Arnold in regard to their respective grand discoveries. I should be obliged to the Secretary if he would read a few extracts for me. I wish to show by better authority than that cited by the gentleman, that the position assumed by me this morning in regard to Roman history, is correct.

"The tribunes had not yet begun to make their complaints, when they were anticipated by the consul Sp. Cassius, who, being already in high favor with the popular party, continued to flatter the passions of the inferior class, and is said to have aimed at an improper and dangerous influence in the State. He affected great zeal for the rights of the people, and proportional indignation against their oppressors. He complained, in particular, of the improper use which had been recently made of the conquered lands by suffering them to become the property of persons who were already too rich. Having himself made some conquests, he showed how the lands of the Republic ought to have been disposed of by making an equal division of his own acquisitions among the more indigent citizens."

"But while Cassius alarmed the rich with the danger to their property, he at the same time alarmed every citizen with danger to his personal consequence by offering the freedom of the city to every alien, &c."

"And, though the author perished in the attempt, the subject itself was entailed on the commonwealth as a subject of dissension and became the source of repeated demands on the part of the people." See Ferguson's Rome, page 18, sec. 2; Livy, lib. II., c. 41.

Here is the argument of Tiberius Gracchus, to the patricians, urging them to submit to the agrarian law. He certainly would not use language or arguments such as are here set forth, unless he wished to divide the lands of the patricians amongst the plebeians—

"He exhorted the present proprietors of land whom the law of division might effect, not to withhold, for the sake of a trifling interest to themselves, so great an advantage from their country. He bade them consider whether they would not, by the secure possession of five hundred jugera, and of half as much to each of their children, be sufficiently rewarded for the concessions now required in behalf of the republic; put them in mind that riches were merely comparative, and that in respect to this advantage, they were still to remain in the first rank of their fellow-citizens." Ferguson's Rome, 94; see also Appian; do. Bell Civ.

I will now call the attention of the Convention to the writings of the great Cicero, who ought on such subjects to be good authority, especially as he was a Roman by birth, and her greatest orator—a little better, I should judge, than Arnold:

"But those, who, designing to curry their favor, attempt new laws about the leveling of estates, so as to force the right owners from their lawful possessions; or proposing to make creditors remit all debts which in justice are due to them; plainly undermine the two principal pillars and supports of the government. In the first place, concord and unity amongst the citizens; which can never be kept up while some are deprived of what is justly their due, and others discharged from the necessity of payment. Secondly, justice; which immediately must sink into ruin and nothing if men cannot be secured in the possession of what is their own; for that, as we before remarked, is the chief end and aim of men's getting into societies; and building of cities, that each one might freely enjoy without any danger or fear of being deprived of it. Besides this, the authors of these pernicious designs never get that good will which they propose from the citizens. For as for those men who are losers by such a method; it is certain they will be their enemies for it; and those who are gainers will be sure to pretend that they never desired it."

"Besides, what reason or equity is there when estates have been held for a great many years, or perhaps ages, that the rightful owner should be thrust out from them, and others that never had any, should come and possess them." Tully's Offices, book 2, chap. 22.

In the succeeding chapter of the same work one of the causes which led to the suggestions of the great Cicero which have just been read is plainly apparent. He says—

"Pray what is it that ruined our own two Gracchi sons of the famous Tiberius Gracchus, and grandsons of Africanus, but only these controversies about leveling estates?" Chap. 23, lb.

I will cite but one more authority, the great Roman historian, Livy, to show that my position was correct:

"Accordingly, Caius Licinius (or Stolo) and Lucius Sextus were elected tribunes, and proposed several new laws; every one of which was injurious to the power of the patricians, and in favor of the interests of the plebeians. One related to debt, enacting that whatever had been paid as interest, being deducted from the principal, the remainder shall be discharged in three years by so many equal instalments. Another, setting bounds to landed property, enacted that no one should possess over five hundred acres (jugera?) of land." 2 Livy, VI. Book, Sec. 35—see also Ferguson's Rome, page 27.

I have had these authorities read, sir, for the purpose of showing not only what the history of the agrarian movements was, but also to show what some of the great Romans thought on such subjects. I think it will scarcely be doubted that Cicero and Livy were not only competent, but the very best of judges on such subjects, and should be far preferred to any modern writers.

It has been urged, that because seventeen States have adopted the Homestead principle, that Indiana should also adopt it. In other words, if seventeen States should adopt any bad law, we should follow their example. Do gentlemen forget with what enthusiasm the general bankrupt law was hailed in 1841? That law was received by the united voice of twenty-six States; and yet the breath of life had been scarcely breathed into it, before it was repealed. And yet, sir, in my opinion, that bankrupt law, though to me odious, is preferable in some respects to the provisions embraced in the amendments offered by the gentleman from Huntington.

The bankrupt law took all the property of the applicant, (except what the court might allow,) and discharged him from his debts. The amendments propose to allow to the applicant $500, if he should own land, exempt from execution, which would virtually release him from his indebtedness. The bankrupt law would not have materially injured the credit of the poor, while the amendments proposed would strike at its very root. Besides this parallel, doors to fraud would, in my opinion, be much wider open under these amendments, than under the bankrupt law of 1841.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). The gentleman from Posey does not say how it impairs credit.

Mr. HOVEY. That, I think, I have already shown in my remarks this morning. No man who is permitted by law to hold back five hundred dollars will be able to get credit. Especially the poor man, because the creditor will say to himself, "this man must be worth more than $500 before I can make my debt, and therefore I will not credit him."

I wish now to make a few remarks in regard to the original section reported by the committee. I cannot look upon that section with any allowance. I regard it as a demagogical section, calculated to make favor with the friends of the homestead. Sir, it means nothing—it has neither soul nor body. It is an empty declaration that the Legislature may obey or evade at their pleasure. They have all the power without it that they can have with it. I do not like to see gentlemen sneaking behind such a provision, and declare, "we voted for the principle of the Homestead." The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) and the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Wallace) view this section in the right light. Come out, gentlemen, you pretended friends of the Homestead, come out; show your hands; don't dodge the responsibility; do not attempt to throw upon the Legislature the duty of enacting a law which you yourselves are ashamed or afraid to endorse. Go the full figure; vote for the minimum of $500, and you will have the labors of this Convention thrown back upon your hands with a withering rebuke.

My colleague says, that we have abolished imprisonment for debt, passed laws allowing one hundred and twenty-five dollars exempt from execution without injury, and hence he argues the propriety of establishing by law some Homestead provision similar in details to these amendments. Now, sir, I am willing to admit that the abolishing imprisonment for debt, and the exemption of the one hundred and twenty-five dollars, are wise and humane provisions; but I think the conclusion that he attempts to draw from those facts, will not sustain the exemption of five hundred dollars. If five hundred, why not a thousand? and if a thousand, why not abolish all laws for the collection of debt? We would then be with the gentleman fully up to his anticipated reforms.

Again: he alludes to the poor boy which I presented by way of illustration, and asks if property is the principal basis of credit, how he would be able to obtain it? The gentleman must have misunderstood me—probably in consequence of my rapid style of utterance. I gave the reason why that young man could get credit, without having the actual possession of property, under our law as it now is.<sup>a</sup> I said that the man who had the muscular strength, the bones and sinews, with industry and economy, had within himself a gold mine which would always produce the means of payment. And on the contrary, no difference how honorable and good a man's intentions might be, if he should be feeble, diseased, and without property he could not procure credit, thus plainly showing that honor is not the basis of credit.

In conclusion, I wish to call the attention of the Convention to the course of action which we have taken in regard to our old Constitution. We were sent here to make a few simple amendments to that instrument, and now we are entirely revolutionizing it. Not an article, scarcely a section, a sentence, a word; scarcely a comma of the old Constitution left by our committees with the tail side down! All is novelty, and the motto of some of the great men of this Convention is, "radical reform and destruction to all our old laws and institutions." I trust in God, however, that such will not be the final result.

Pending the question,

On motion of Mr. PEPPER of Crawford, the Convention adjourned until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

SPEECH OF MR. WALLACE,

On Mr. Pettit's Resolution proposing to abolish the Grand Jury system, delivered Monday Afternoon, October 21st, 1850.

I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) for offering the amendment now under consideration. It, in my humble estimation, changes the character of the original resolution offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) in a most material point. Instead of being imperative as the terms of that resolution are, it proposes to make it the duty of the committee simply to inquire into the expediency of abolishing our Grand Jury system. And surely, sir, so radical a change as this would be, in a matter so important in the administration of our criminal law, deserves to be approached by us with great caution, and not to be made only after the most searching and careful examination. My experience in legislation teaches me that all investigations can be better and more satisfactorily made by and in committees, than by and in an assembly so numerous as this is; but unless we sustain the proposed amendment, the committee can have no discretion whatever; they can make no investigations; and no matter how clearly they may be convinced of the impolicy of the measure, they are nevertheless bound to report it back to us with all its errors and imperfections. I trust, therefore, that the Convention will adopt the amendment, and let the subject go to the committee untrammelled by any imperative instructions whatever.

In the course of the last two or three years, the Legislature of the State made various changes in the mode and manner of administering the criminal law in this county. They took from our Circuit Court, and consequently from our Grand Juries, original and exclusive jurisdiction in many of the offenses recognized in our criminal code, and gave it to the justices of the peace. This, sir, has enabled me, in some degree, to see and realize what would be the practical working and effect of the public examinations contended for by the gentleman from Tippecanoe; for, as the law stood prior to the enactments of last winter, unless some one voluntarily came forward and made oath, charging another with the commission of some offense, crime went unpunished, and simply because our magistrates had no power to compel any person against his will to become an informer. To obviate this defect, the Legislature last winter made it the duty of the prosecuting attorney to file informations, and upon such informations, empowered the magistrates to subpoena witnesses, and to compel them to divulge all they knew touching the matters charged therein, thereby giving, or attempting to give, to the prosecuting attorney and the magistrates Grand Jury powers. This, sir, I protest against. I desire to see no man or officer vested with such tremendous power; and more especially when that man or officer's fees or living is made to depend on the number of accusations they can make, or the number of convictions they can procure. But, sir, what does all this prove? Nothing short of this, in my opinion: Criminal justice would fail to be administered in ninety-nine cases in a hundred, if we were to rely exclusively on voluntary accusations. The power, therefore, must be vested somewhere to compel involuntary informations—a point conceded by gentleman on all hands. Where, then, is it safest to place it? In the hands of one, or two, or three interested persons, or in the hands of eighteen or twenty impartial citizens drawn indiscriminately from the body of the people of your county! For my part, I cannot hesitate a moment where I would place it. I would give it to the eighteen or twenty independent freeholders of the county, where the common law placed it a thousand years ago.

But the gentleman from Tippecanoe zealously asks to have the privileges of facing his accusers. Sir, whenever that accuser can be found, (for it most frequently happens that this is the most difficult part of the business,) he will be sure to have him face to face when put upon trial, in court, before the petit jury. But this is not what the gentleman wants. He wants the opportunity of suppressing an accusation, in order that a public trial may be avoided. In other words he would make the tribunal of inquiry a court of trial. Instead of finding the the simple fact that a crime has been committed, and that a certain person committed it, he would have it invested with the powers and duties of a petit jury, also, and thereby not only to accuse, but to try and acquit, or condemn. What a beautiful scene our Grand Jury rooms would often present under such a system. It would make it a perfect bear garden—a place of strife and confusion, where the poor would be made to succumb to the rich, and the weak to the strong and influential. Let the gentleman's system be once established, and my word for it, we would find it a system calculated to suppress prosecutions, and to encourage the commission of crime—for a bold man, truly, would he be, then who would dare publicly and voluntarily to file an accusation against any one, and especially if that one happened to be a man of high standing and influence in the community.

Sir, it is not my object at present to discuss this question fully. I know it would be out of order, but I hope at some other time to be able to speak of it more at large. One point, at least, is certain. We should be exceedingly careful how we attempt a radical change in a measure so important as this is, lest in the endeavor to avoid the evil we should run into a much greater one. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will prevail.

TUESDAY, Nov. 26, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MYERS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports from committees,

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section exempting a reasonable amount of property from forced sale and execution.

The pending question being on Mr. WALPOLE'S amendment, fixing the amount of property to be exempted at not less than five hundred dollars in value,

Mr. FOLEY moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays; and ten delegates rising to second the demand, they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 81, nays 39—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimbley, Watts, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Cole, Colfax, Dick, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, McGuire, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Shoup, Spann, Taylor, Thomas, Walpole, Wheeler, and Wundelrich—39

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to amend by inserting the words "not less than four hundred dollars."

Mr. CARR of Jackson moved that the section and the pending amendment be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HALL. I wish to call the attention of the Convention to a resolution adopted at a public meeting in the county that I, in part, represent, in relation to the subject now before the Convention. The delegates on this floor, who represent the northern portion of this State, seem to think that the people call for the incorporation of this provision in the Constitution. I doubt not but that is the opinion of the constituents of those gentlemen who support this proposition. At the same time, I must be permitted to say, that such is not the opinion or wishes of the people in the south, or at least that portion of them I have the honor, in part, to represent. They want no such provision embodied in their Constitution. And if they shall desire to change the amount of property now exempt by law from execution, they want to be left free to do so, through their representatives in the General Assembly.

On yesterday, when this question was before the Convention, the delegate from Fulton, (Mr. Miller,) in order to give this question strength, stated, that, at the last session of the Legislature, a proposition similar to the one now before the Convention was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading in the House of Representatives; and that it would have passed that body, had it not been for the consideration that the Convention to amend the Constitution was soon to convene, and that it was thought to be a subject that would certainly be agitated before that body. The vote in favor of engrossing the bill was quoted by the gentleman as a declaration of public sentiment, expressed through their representatives. Now, in relation to that matter, I will give the gentleman this piece of information. The representative from the county I represent in this Convention cast his vote in favor of the measure; and I am fully authorized by the state of facts to say, that the people whom he represented disapproved of his vote on that question. In fact, I believe I may further assert, that, but for that vote, the gentleman referred to would have been elected a delegate to this Convention. It is true, he was not a candidate, but from his high standing in society, I believe, but for that vote, the people would have placed him in nomination, and then have elected him.

But this is not all the evidence I have that the people of my county are opposed to ingrafting this provision in the Constitution. Early last spring, the people of the county held a convention at Princeton, (of which due notice was given,) for the purpose of expressing their sentiments in relation to such amendments as they thought ought to be ingrafted in the new Constitution. Amongst other resolutions, they adopted the following:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient to adopt a homestead exemption."

Sir, such a provision ought never to be ingrafted in a Constitution, but should be left free to be acted upon by the Legislature. An amount of property to be secured to the debtor free from execution at one time, may be very inadequate at another time; and such has been the experience and practice in this State upon that subject. Go back twenty-five years, and you will find that the Legislature then thought that fifty dollars' worth of property was the proper amount to be exempt from execution. At a subsequent period, as the people in the country became more wealthy, the subject was again brought before the Legislature, and one hundred dollars' worth of property was exempted. And, following the same principle of passing laws to suit the exigencies of the people, at a still later period, the amount exempted covered one hundred and twenty-five dollars. And who can tell, but that the gold coming amongst us may be increased in amount so far beyond the anticipation of the most sanguine, as to work an entire change in the value of property. If such shall prove to be the case, and if a cow and calf, now worth ten dollars, shall, in consequence of such influx of the precious metal, be advanced in value to one hundred dollars, then the amount of property in value to be exempted, should be increased in a corresponding ratio.

The power of the Legislature to exempt from execution such an amount of property as may be deemed expedient, has never been questioned. It has been done by the Legislature time and time again; and such acts have always received the sanction of our courts of justice. Why, then, insert a clause in the Constitution giving the Legislature the power to exempt such property from execution as may be thought right? It is useless—wore than useless. It is incumbering the Constitution with such matter as has no business there. I shall, therefore, vote for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

Mr. MAY. Nothing but the very deep interest which I take in the question which is now before us, induces me to trouble the Convention with the few remarks I now desire to offer. I am well aware, sir, that there are many gentlemen on this floor who can so speak on this and other questions as to interest the Convention, far more than I can possibly do. I know, also, that there are many gentlemen, some of whom have not yet spoken upon this question, who can do that, to which I certainly make no pretensions, namely, instruct members of this Convention by their remarks. And, sir, in addition to all this, I know very well that the question now before us, has been already fully, and, as it seems to me, very ably discussed, sir, in a manner far beyond my power, and leaving nothing which is really important to be added. But yet, Mr. President, notwithstanding all this, I am desirous of saying a word or two, and for the following reason solely: I take so deep an interest in the question now under discussion, that I am unwilling it should pass in review before us, and receive from me no other testimonial of my opinion than that which will be afforded by the record of my silent vote.

I am not aware, Mr. President, that I have any overweening sympathy for that portion of our community known as the debtor class—the insolvent, the "bankrupt" portion, as some gentlemen in their speeches have styled it. As I look around and about me, I fancy that I can see all the elements of prosperity existing in such abundance that I am justified in coming to the conclusion that in the vast majority of instances when a man comes into a condition of destitution, it is the result of his own misconduct. I repeat it, sir, I have usually found it true that pecuniary misfortune results either from wanton mismanagement or gross negligence.

I know, sir, that misfortune frequently comes upon a man unawares. I know there is a tide in the affairs of men into which if a man falls, when at the ebb, he may be swept on to adversity, just as there is said to be a tide in the affairs of men, which taken at the flood, leads on to fortune; but I believe that, in a large majority of cases success is the result of earnest and persevering endeavor, and that a reverse of fortune is but the just and righteous retribution which always follows in the wake of negligence and misconduct. I say then, it is not on account of any great sympathy with the debtor class in community that I espouse the cause of a liberal Homestead Exemption.

But, sir, while I say this, while I say I have no peculiar sympathy with the debtor class in community, I say that I now have, and hope ever to have, a sympathy, a deep sympathy, with the families of men who are thus involved in embarrassment; and it is for this reason, and for this reason alone, that I advocate the principle which is embraced in the proposition now under consideration.

I will ask gentlemen to consider, in the first place, of what every man's family consists. It consists, as all know, in the first place, of the mother of the family, and, secondly, of the children of the family. Now, sir, are not these, every one of them, from the oldest to the youngest, members of society who, as society is now constructed, though we know not how radical a change may soon come over us in this respect, utterly helpless and dependent? We know, sir, that they are dependent—every one of them dependent, wholly dependent upon him who is their natural protector, the head of the family. Now, sir, let us take the instance of a man, who, by reason of his own negligence, or dishonesty if you please, for I am willing that the case should be an extreme one—let us, I say, take the case of a man, who from his own gross negligence or from palpable dishonesty has brought his pecuniary affairs to the verge of ruin. I admit—I have already admitted—this ruin which threatens to overwhelm him, to be but just and righteous retribution for his misconduct, but I ask gentlemen if it is right that others should be as fully involved in this ruin, who are wholly guiltless of wrong? It seems to me it is not right. More than this—it seems to me it is our duty to prevent this calamity from falling upon the innocent and helpless, if by any interposition of ours it can be averted.

Sir, as we acknowledge the principle that, when for his misconduct, a man is deprived of his life or liberty, the family of that man shall not in consequence of that misconduct, lose their life and their liberty, so upon the same ground I think we should recognize this principle, that when a man is deprived of his property, his home, his all, the family of that man need not necessarily be deprived of their property, their home, their all.

It seems to me, Mr. President, I can clearly see in this Convention—and, sir, it is a thing which I have been much gratified to see—I say, it seems to me I can see a strong determination to secure to the young and rising generation, the right to demand of the State a reasonable education. There is apparently, amongst us all, a warm sympathy for the institution of Common Schools. From every portion of the State we hear propositions to cherish and extend the benefits of this humble, but useful institution. And, sir, this is as it should be. Well, sir, why is it that our Common Schools are a desirable institution? The answer is plain. Because, thereby those who are to succeed us will be qualified for the better discharge of the duties which will ultimately devolve upon them. Now, sir, it seems to me that we have in our midst a more important institution, if I may so call it, than the Common Schools of our land.

It seems to me that there is a place where the young are more effectually trained to become worthy members of society than they can ever be made in any system of Common Schools ever yet devised. That place is the family circle, the child's home.

It may not be here, sir, that their intellectual training is completed, but it is by the fire-side, it is at home, sir, that every one, I care not who he is, has received the principal part of the moral training that he has ever received. I believe, sir, that the convictions of every member of the Convention will bear me out in this. Yes, sir, I undertake to say that so much moral education as we have ever received, so many moral principles as have ever been instilled in us, have been received by us at our homes, at our firesides, under the influence of our parents' teaching. Then, if this be true, I say that any system, any honorable system, which tends to ensure the perpetuity of the homes, and of the fire-sides in our land, is a system which deserves to be encouraged by us, whether sitting here as legislators, or whether acting in our private and individual capacity.

From some remarks which have been made, I understand it to be charged upon the advocates of Homestead Exemption, that they urge its adoption as the favorite measure of one portion—a single section—of the State. It has been intimated, sir, by the gentleman who has just taken his seat—though it was, I confess, nothing more than an intimation—that this is a sort of sectional measure. So far as I recollect, it is true that those who have advocated it have come, perhaps, from the extreme northern portion of the State; and, sir, I believe those who have opposed the measure—and not many, thus far, have opposed it—have come from the extreme southern portion of the State. But, sir, notwithstanding all this, it seems to me that this is not, in any sense of the term, a sectional measure. I know it has not, heretofore, been so considered. It was not so considered, at any rate, to mention a single instance, during the last session of the Legislature of this State. I recollect very well, sir, that this same question, as has been already stated by gentlemen, was agitated before the members of that body. And, sir, I recollect somewhat of the circumstances attending that agitation. My impression has ever been, that the project, so soon as it was introduced, was received with great favor by the representatives not only of one, but of every portion of the State. And, sir, I have before me that which I think will conclusively satisfy every gentleman on this floor, that at that time this measure was regarded with favor in all sections of the State. Gentlemen cannot deny this if they concede that those who were then representatives fairly expressed the will of their constituents. I say I have that before me which I think will satisfy honorable members that the people of this State were, at one period at least, as a general thing, in favor of the principle of Homestead Exemption. On the 390th page of the Journal of the House of Representatives of the last Legislature, it will be seen that the Homestead Exemption bill which was then pending before that body, came up for its second reading. The proceedings on the second reading, as every gentleman on this floor well knows, are generally decisive of the fate of a bill. It is upon the second reading of a bill that the disposition of members is manifested either to receive it with favor or hostility. Well, sir, on the second reading of the bill to which I have referred, a motion was made by a gentleman, who is now a member of this Convention, to lay the bill on the table. Upon that motion, sir, there were then and there given nineteen votes in the affirmative and seventy in the negative. I say, sir, that at that stage, a stage of the proceedings when it was expected by all that members would manifest their aversion to, or their acceptance of, the general principle involved in the bill, by a vote of nearly four to one, the representatives of the State expressed their satisfaction with the principle, and their desire to have it incorporated in the laws of the land.

Now, sir, a gentleman has risen here and stated that one representative who favored the bill then under consideration, misrepresented the will of his constituents. Unquestionably that is so, and as unquestionably other like instances can be found. But I believe that for every one who misrepresented the will of his constituents in the manner which the gentleman intimates, namely, by voting in favor of the principle of Homestead Exemption, there can be found at least a corresponding one who misrepresented them by voting the other way.

Well sir, I might trace this bill through from the beginning to the final vote on which it was lost, for it did not become a law. But sir, I should trespass in so doing, too much upon the time of the Convention. This I have no desire to do. I certainly need not say to gentlemen on this floor, gentlemen of so large experience as most of those whom I see before me, that that is a way in which a few enemies of a measure may finally succeed in killing it. I will merely say, in regard to this bill, that it was killed, as many bills are, by being loaded down with obnoxious amendments, amendments which were never intended by those who proposed them to improve the bill, but to destroy it.

This, sir, in addition to the facts already suggested by the gentleman from Fulton, (Mr. Miller,) that there was a conviction in the minds of members of the Legislature, that some principle would be, by us who are now here, ingrafted in the Constitution, contributed to prevent the passage of the bill in the House of Representatives. What may have been the reason of the defeat of a similar measure in the other branch of the last Legislature, I don't know. But, sir, whatever may have been the feeling of the Senate during the last winter in regard to it, I am informed that this same measure has heretofore been before them, and that it has been not only earnestly advocated, but has repeatedly received a vote in its favor almost sufficient to make it the law of the land—at least so far as one branch of our General Assembly can make anything the law of the land.

I say then it is not true, at least so far as I can come to a conclusion in regard to it, it is not true that the public sentiment of the State is adverse to the general principle contained in a homestead exemption law, as we design to frame it. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that the principle will be incorporated in our Constitution. I regret that the matter was introduced, because I fear it will not finally carry in this Convention. And should it finally fail I think I can plainly foresee that the vote here taken will lead to the same result as the votes that have been taken in times past in the Legislature, on the same question. The inference will be drawn that because this measure has been introduced into this Convention and failed to be adopted, that therefore the people of the State are hostile to it. But, sir, while I recognize the wisdom and experience of the Convention, I must be allowed to say that in many respects we do not fairly and fully reflect the popular will. The most of us, sir, are persons of mature age; we have most of us fought the battle of life, and moreover, we have fought it successfully. The time has passed with many of us when we would sympathize with those who are struggling with adversity.

A VOICE. That is the idea.

MR. MAY. I repeat it, and I ask gentlemen if it is not an idea worthy of their consideration. We have most of us so far passed down the vale of life that we have forgotten the obstructions of our early career. If we could place ourselves back where we were twenty or thirty years ago—if we could revive feelings then entertained—I ask if gentlemen would receive this proposition as they seem now disposed to receive it? Memory rests chiefly on the sunny spots of our past lives, and those passages which were clouded with difficulties are forgotten. When we are contending with difficulties we more correctly appreciate them than when we have surmounted the obstacles.

But, Mr. President, I will not detain the Convention by enlarging on this topic. Gentlemen can bear me witness that I do not often trouble the Convention with any remarks. I rose simply to express the deep interest which I feel in the question that is before us, and to say that it is a question which I will at all times and in all places sustain. I care very little how it may be disposed of at the present time; but, sir, as surely as the sun now circles through the Heavens and sets to-night to rise to-morrow, so surely will the principle of homestead exemption be ultimately ingrafted into the law of the land. I think, sir, that in this matter I can plainly foresee the current of popular sentiment. I think that I have, perhaps, for the last few years, mingled more freely with the class who are in favor of this law than some gentlemen on this floor who are otherwise of larger experience than myself; and, sir, I am almost ready to say I know that, as in time past, there has been a determination on the part of the people that a man's liberty should be sacred, so now there is a like determination that every man's home—that fireside around which he has set up his household gods—shall be sacred from the intrusion of his enemies.

Gentlemen may say, as I know gentlemen have already said, that this is a matter for legislation alone, and not suitable to be ingrafted into the Constitutional law of the land. My idea of a Constitution, sir, is, in a few words, as follows: It is the deliberate recognition and solemn enunciation of certain general truths to which we, as a whole people, declare we will adhere. Legislation, on the other hand, I conceive to be made up of the details which grow out of those truths. I ask gentlemen whether it is any more or less than the recognition of a general truth, to declare that a man's homestead should be exempted to him and his family?

I have regretted, Mr. President, to see the attempts that have been made, though made, I am aware, in a friendly spirit, to encumber this general principle. I have already declared, I believe, that I would willingly have let the whole matter go by, and would have consented that nothing should have been attempted by this Convention. I would have consented to this for the reasons which I have already stated. But, sir, the subject is now before us. It has been brought here by other agency than my own. Inasmuch as something has been attempted, I, of course, desire to see it carried through. But, sir, even now, I desire that no more shall be done than simply recognize and declare the general truth, the general principle, that a man's homestead shall be at all times safe from the hostile intrusions of others.

I had designed, Mr. President, and if an opportunity offer, still design, to bring up before the Convention, something which will enable us to vote upon the general principle by itself, not encumbered with any specifications concerning the valuation of the homestead to be exempted, nor by any other details. I have accordingly drawn up, and have now before me, an amendment, in which, sir, I propose to amend the section reported by the committee, as follows:

After the word "property," in the third line, I propose to insert the following words: "Including the homestead owned by any debtor, the head of a family."

If any gentleman will take the trouble to examine the section, he will find it will then read as follows:

"The privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life, shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property, including the Homestead owned by any debtor, the head of a family, from seizure or sale, for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted."

Now, sir, the words which I have proposed may not, perhaps, be the most suitable—they may not be inserted in the proper place. In inserting them, my only desire was that the section should be amended in such a manner as that it would recognize and be moreover mandatory upon the members of the Legislature to recognize this general principle, that a homestead, belonging to the head of a family, shall be exempted from seizure and compulsory sale upon execution. And, sir, all details and specifications respecting the value of property, or of the homestead to be thus exempted I would leave entirely to the Legislature, upon whom I would make it compulsory to recognize the general principle. Of course, I hope sir, that the vote about to be taken will not sustain the motion to indefinitely postpone. I hope the question will not be indefinitely postponed. My opinion is that though such a vote may carry with us, though it may be indefinitely postponed by us, this same question will be revived and perhaps at a much earlier day than is anticipated by gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. HOVEY. I wish to make a personal explanation. In the heat of debate on yesterday evening, I used language which was calculated to wound the feelings of the committee who reported the section under debate.

I wish to say to the members of that committee, collectively and severally, that I had no wish or intention to wound any one's feelings or impute bad motives to any member of that committee.

My aim was to show the character of the section—that it was a mere shadow that might appease and satisfy the friends of the homestead principle, without accomplishing the end proposed. I hope that no gentleman will regard the language I used on that occasion as personal.

Mr. BOWERS. I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a speech. Indeed, sir, I have formed a resolution that, under no circumstances shall this Convention be detained by a lengthy speech from me. Speech-making is not the business for which I came here. The people whom I have the honor to represent, entrusted me with a seat on this floor for a different purpose. They believe that we already have a good Constitution; which, with a few slight amendments, would meet the wants and expectations of the people. They sent me here to assist in making those amendments. They, as well as myself, expected that every delegate would come here prepared to vote for every amendment which they deemed necessary and proper, and to vote against all others. And, sir, if every member of this body would act upon this principle, our work would be as well done, as it is likely to be as we are now doing, and the labors of this Convention would shortly come to a close.

To say the least, Mr. President, if members would curtail the length of their speeches, and lessen them in number, the business of this Convention would be quite as well done, and the length of the session very much shortened.

The people of the State already begin to think (and not without reason) that something is wrong. Frequent inquiries are made as to when the Convention will get through? Sir, these questions will never be answered with any certainty, so long as days and weeks are spent in arguing questions that could be as well disposed of without a word of discussion, as they can after a long and windy debate. Members had better do their voting here, and go home and make their speeches to their constituents. They will then cost the State nothing, and will be more likely to accomplish the purpose for which they are designed.

Mr. President, I hope the Convention will pardon this digression from the purpose for which I rose. My object was to correct an error that my friend on the right (Mr. May) has fallen into. He infers, because a motion to lay the Homestead Exemption law of last winter, upon the table, failed by a large majority, that the people of the State are in favor of adopting the measure in the Constitution, and that the action of this Convention is not likely to reflect the will of the people.

On examining the vote to which he refers I find the vote of the representative from the county that I, in part, represent in this Convention, recorded against laying that bill on the table; yet, sir, I can assure the gentleman that a majority of the citizens of that county are opposed to ingrafting any provision of this kind in the Constitution.

Mr. MILLER. Your representative voted against engrossing the bill.

Mr. BOWERS. Aye, sir, and by that vote he secured a seat in the other end of this building for three years. I recollect, sir, that, when his vote against laying the bill upon the table was first made known to his constituents, it produced no little excitement; and when he became a candidate for a seat in the Senate, he found it necessary to refer to his vote on the engrossment of the bill, to remove the prejudice that his former vote had produced.

I recollect further, that when the canvass for seats in the Convention commenced, some one or two of the candidates seemed to favor the measure, but before we had gone far in that journey of life that candidates alone are allowed to enjoy, they became satisfied that they were on the wrong scent, and I will venture the assertion that a candidate who would have avowed himself in favor of going further than to recognize the principle as it is now recognized in the existing Constitution, and the courts of justice, could not have obtained three hundred votes out of nearly three thousand, that might be cast in that county. I do not doubt that my colleague will fully endorse this assertion, and yet this vote of the representative of that county last year is produced to show that the people of that county are in favor of this measure.

I, sir, am not opposed to the principle of exemption, but I wish it left as the more appropriate business of legislative enactment.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is probably no question that is better settled in the minds of the people of this country, than the principle of exemption. I believe you will scarcely find a man anywhere, who will deny the right of the unfortunate debtor to have a reasonable amount of property exempted from seizure for debt. And I doubt whether there is any man in this Convention who fears that if such a provision be incorporated in the Constitution, it will in the slightest degree endanger its adoption by the people. It will be for the Legislature to determine what amount shall be exempted; and they will, of course, exempt such amount as they think reasonable. I say the principle is so well established, it has been acted upon so long that there need be no apprehension that, if incorporated in the Constitution, it will not be acted upon by the Legislature.

The main question here, it seems to me, is as to the propriety of placing it in the Constitution at all; for the question is not now as to Homestead Exemption, but merely exemption—merely a declaration of the principle. Well, sir, there have been many arguments advanced in favor of the propriety of placing it in the Constitution, that struck me with a great deal of force. It was said by the gentleman from Lagrange, that the reason why this principle should be placed in the Constitution, is that it is right—that it is a correct principle. This is certainly a very plausible reason why it should be placed there, but when you examine the matter carefully, you will see that it is not necessary that it should be inserted in the Constitution, merely because it is right. It is not necessary to place everything that is right in the Constitution; if you do, you will have a pretty large volume. I ask you if it is not right that the man who commits murder, should be punished? Yet you do not think it necessary to declare explicitly in the Constitution that he shall be punished, and what his punishment shall be. It is right that a man who commits theft, should be punished. Yet no one contends that we should place any such declaration in the Constitution. It is right that a man should pay his honest debts; yet you do not put that in the Constitution. Then we see, from a very short examination, that there are many things that are right in themselves, which it is not necessary to put in the Constitution.

Nor is it proper to insert in the Constitution a declaration of every principle that is right. And, as has been justly remarked by the gentleman from Gibson, it is improper to place this in the Constitution, for the reasons that I have given, and for another very plain reason. The amount necessary to be exempted cannot be ascertained for a period of ten years to come. What may be the correct amount to-day, may not be a sufficient amount five or ten years hence. But I will ask this Convention whether they can determine what should be the amount exempted twenty years to come? You cannot fix the amount, because the value of property is uncertain. And this uncertainty makes this question one concerning which you should not form a Constitutional provision. Why, no proposition that has been submitted to the Convention in relation to this subject, has attempted to fix the amount.

A MEMBER. Leave that to the Legislature.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is exactly where it ought to be left. Now if, in consequence of the value of property being uncertain, you cannot fix the maximum amount, neither can you fix the minimum. I recollect the time, and it is not very long ago, when a horse could be bought for eighty dollars, which now would cost a hundred. Hence, no precise amount can be fixed so long as the value of property is fluctuating. Such matters, then, should be left entirely to the Legislature. And I should have no fears of leaving it with the Legislature. What is your Legislature? It is a body which reflects the public sentiment; and whenever the community desires that there shall be an increase of property exemption, it will be so enacted. The Legislature carries out the popular sentiment as it exists from time to time. And if at any time the representatives of the public fail to vote for such measures as meet the wishes of those by whom they are elected, they are, at the ensuing election, left at home, and others selected in their stead.

But there are some difficulties about this Homestead Exemption which probably should be noticed a little further. A proposition was offered the other day by the gentleman from Huntington. Now if any man will examine that proposition, he will find that notwithstanding the friends of Homestead Exemption desire to put it in the Constitution because, as they say, it is right, yet its friends have failed to make it permanent.

You will notice that the proposition of the gentleman from Huntington provides that a Homestead shall be secured to the amount of not less than five hundred dollars. But an individual who has not a home is turned over to the tender mercies of the Legislature. No provision is made for him; it is left to the Legislature to provide a reasonable amount, according to his wants.

Mr. WALPOLE. I desire to correct the gentleman. The proposition of the gentleman from Huntington is not now before the Convention. The proposition before the Convention provides that the holders of personal property and of real estate shall be precisely in the same position, in regard to the amount of property exempted.

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely so.

I was going to show, sir, that the gentlemen themselves do not attempt to fix the amount above or below which the exemption shall not go, and that they cannot fix the amount. I am alluding to this in the way of argument, to show that the amount cannot be fixed, and I say that the gentlemen themselves, in the propositions they have submitted, have not attempted to fix the amount.

The gentlemen are beset with difficulties on all hands, and are driven at last to leave the matter to the Legislature; and even the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) only fixes the amount below which the exemption shall not go. This shows that they have to leave it at last to the Legislature. Well, now, when this kind of absurdity is exhibiting itself, I ask, is it not best to leave the whole matter there? When you have ascertained that there is any danger that the Legislature will not regulate that matter, then it may be proper to frame a Constitutional provision on the subject.

And, sir, there is one thing about this that should satisfy gentlemen. Your Legislature has been increasing the amount of exemption every year; they have never reduced it. This very fact should satisfy the Convention that it ought not to be put in the Constitution, where, if you undertake to fix the amount, you can never alter it; but if you trust it to the people themselves, through their representatives, to say what it shall be, if they make it too great they can reduce it; if too little, they can increase it.

But, sir, suppose you have carried out the proposition that the friends of Homestead Exemption desire should be carried out. See the difficulty that you will get into; with a Homestead to the amount of five hundred dollars exempted from forced sale—and the gentleman from Laporte desires that the provision should be a little firmer than human laws can make it—suppose, I say, you have a Homestead of the value of five hundred dollars exempted, how will you be able to collect any taxes? You cannot collect taxes upon this property, because you cannot enforce payment by sale of the property.

Mr. NILES. If the gentleman will allow me to make a correction, I will say that I have never assumed or even dreamed of any such thing as that property should be exempt from taxation. Taxes for the support of government are a debt which all good citizens can and must pay.

Mr. STEVENSON. I speak of the provision upon the evidence that I have before me on paper.

I have been endeavoring to show the danger of putting in the Constitution a permanent provision of this kind, and the propriety of leaving it to the Legislature; and I say that if you declare that a certain amount shall be exempted, I defy any Legislature that can be convened here to take that property for taxes, either from the owner or from the individual who may have it in charge to manage on behalf of the owner. If you introduce this provision into the Constitution it will carry this construction along with it. I maintain, then, that it is dangerous and improper to place it there. I believe the gentleman from Hancock said, the other day, that there were seventeen States that had made provision for Homestead Exemption.

Mr. WALPOLE. I have not the Constitutions of all the States, but I believe there are about that number that have adopted the principle of Homestead Exemption. The gentleman from Posey can perhaps inform us.

Mr. OWEN. Sixteen States have adopted it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Sir, I have seen but two instances in which it has been made a Constitutional provision; those are the State of Texas and the State of Wisconsin. And, sir, I will refer for a moment to the Constitution of Wisconsin. I believe it is an exact copy of this—to show that they saw the same, and that their position on the subject really amounts to nothing at all.

Well now, sir, this thing amounts to nothing, because it leaves the whole matter discretionary with the Legislature. It leaves it in the power of the Legislature to determine what amount is reasonable and right, and if the Legislature does not determine, the provision is a nullity. It has no vitality, no force or effect. Your Legislature, under the old Constitution, could pass a Homestead Exemption law if they chose. They had a right to do anything in reference to the subject that they might deem right, and prudent, and proper, that you had not forbidden them to do, in that Constitution. You may, to be sure, recognize the right of exempting property. I have no objection to that. It can do no harm. Leave it to the people to say, from time to time, what the amount of the exemption shall be. If the Legislature make it too great, they can again reduce it; if not large enough, they can enlarge it from time to time. The difficulty is then in their hands, and they will be responsible. It will do neither good nor harm to adopt a provision of this kind if you leave it discretionary with the Legislature whether they will carry it into effect or not. If you say not a word about it, they will exercise their discretion quite as well. Your provision, then, amounts to nothing.

But as I have said already, gentlemen insist that this provision shall be a permanent one. I say they have not attempted to make it permanent, and for the very best of reasons.

Now I wish to say one word about the matter of credit. And I have no great fears in regard to the effect of such a provision upon a man's credit. A merchant will credit a man whom he believes to be honest and solvent. So far as credit is concerned, it is affected, not generally, but partially, by Homestead Exemption. The man who is worth a thousand dollars can obtain credit as before. It does not affect the rich; they are safe; but it affects the man who owns no greater amount of property than the amount exempted. So it does not affect credit generally but partially. If any one is to suffer it is the poor man. If any one suffers so far as credit is concerned, it is not the merchant or the wealthy farmer, it is not the wealthy belonging to any class, but it is the man who is worth less than the amount exempted. If a want of credit is an injury to an individual, he is injured and no one else.

Well, sir, I was going to say, and my acquaintance, to be sure, is limited, for I have not mixed much with the people of the country generally, but in the county that I represent, we have a few politicians who made a great deal of noise about this matter, and professed to be greatly in favor of Homestead Exemption, the question having been started at the canvass in that county. But, sir, when we got amongst the farmers we found they were opposed, almost universally, to a Homestead Exemption. They were ready to vote against it from one end of the county to the other. If there is any one act of the Convention that will, more than another, endanger the adoption of the Constitution, so far as the vote of that county is concerned, it will be the ingrafting of that principle in it.

Now I say this without any feeling whatever on the subject, because, in relation to this matter, I have little preference, personally, one way or the other; but I have examined the matter carefully, and I can see but little difference between Homestead Exemption and the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. WALPOLE. The gentleman can see no difference between homestead exemption and the bankrupt law.

Mr. GIBSON. It is even worse.

The PRESIDENT. The gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. STEVENSON (continuing). I have examined the arguments that have been adduced carefully. Sir, the great difficulty is for a poor man to make a home for himself. A home must first be obtained before a homestead exemption law can be of any use; and the man who commences poor and acquires by his exertions a farm worth five hundred dollars in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is able to take care of it without the protection of a homestead exemption law. The difficulty is obtaining, not in holding a homestead. Your law will do a man no good while he is acquiring a farm; it only affects those who have farms, and who are improvident and run into debt.

I can see no necessity for taking a step which leads you in advance of public sentiment. My own opinion is that the present exemption of $125 by law is too small, and should be increased in amount. But it is a matter that can be done by the Legislature without your interference, and it should be left to them. Whatever it is right to do, they will do, and they will do it in a proper manner, and at the right time, and it will be much more satisfactory to the people of the State than if you attempt to regulate it by Constitutional provisions.

Mr. BORDEN. It appears to me that the argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat in many respects carries its own answer along with it. The objection that he suggests to inserting in the Constitution a provision on this subject is that it would be improper to make a permanent provision respecting the details. That only shows that there is a necessity for defining and declaring the principle. There is no necessity for prescribing the details. That is, as has been truly said, a matter for the Legislature to arrange and determine. But the question now before the Convention is upon the indefinite postponement of the whole subject. Well, sir, when that course is taken by a deliberative body with respect to any measure, it is regarded as the most emphatic expression that can be given of the entire disapprobation of the principles involved in the measure; it is tantamount to a declaration that it is not worthy of further consideration. I do not say that the gentleman who made the motion intended that it should be regarded in that light, but I ask him if he is willing to make such a declaration in regard to this proposition. What is the proposition? The section reported by the committee reads as follows:

That is the question to be decided, is it true or is it not? If it be true why should we not say so? Why should we not declare it? The gentleman says we are under no obligation to put into the Constitution everything that is true, merely because it is true. Certainly not; but this is one of those subjects which is now agitating the public mind, and concerning which we are assembled here to deliberate. The gentleman says that details should not be put in the Constitution. Very true, and there is no necessity for any such thing. But we may by a few brief comprehensive words declare cardinal principles; and this is what I hope we will do, and nothing else. Those gentlemen who agree with me in this view will of course vote against the motion for indefinite postponement, in order that we may have a direct expression of the sense of the Convention upon the proposition. Surely the Convention is not prepared to say that the privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessities of life shall not be recognized by law. That is the proposition, and it is one that I recognize. I believe that the privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life should be recognized by law, and I wish to see it so declared in the Constitution that we are about to form, so as to place it beyond the power of the Legislature to refuse it.

Before taking my seat, I wish to make an observation in regard to a matter of controversy that arose yesterday between the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) and myself. I rose yesterday, not for the purpose of entering into the discussion of this question—because, as I remarked, I saw that the House was impatient with the debate, and was anxious to come to a vote—but to explain what I understood in reference to a statement made by him.

I may have misconceived what he said at the time. The gentleman, in his remarks, alluded to the couplet that I quoted the other day, and intimated that it was not in good classical taste. The gentleman is a better judge of such matters than I am, and I will not for a moment contend with him in matters of taste; it served, however, at the time, to express my idea, in my own humble way, and that was all that I desired. The gentleman went further, and reiterated the assertion that there was, in the Roman Republic, a party which desired to take the property of the rich and give it to the poor; and, to sustain this position, caused several extracts from authors which he produced to be read at the Secretary's table, and intimated, as I thought, in rather a sarcastic manner, that he thought them much better authority than myself. Now, sir, I again repeat that there never was such a party in Rome as he describes, or at least, if there was, the agrarians, to whom he alludes, never advocated such principles. If I understand the matter, sir, the agrarian laws of Rome were simply the land laws of that country—nothing more nor less. They simply provided that the public lands which were conquered from the Italian tribes by the Romans, after reserving a certain portion for the patricians, that the remainder of it should be divided among the Romans who were landless; but no one was to have more than seven acres. This position he denies.

Now it is very evident that the gentleman and myself use different translations of the original Latin authors—as I suppose he is, like myself, not very familiar with the original—and the different translators, it is well known, give sometimes constructions very different from each other. All that I have to say is, that I judge of the men of those times very much as I judge of men now. Do you suppose that Cicero differed in feeling, and habits of thought, and action from the great men of the present day? Sir, the gentleman has introduced an extract from this great orator to sustain his position; but let me say to him that I presume that Cicero thought as a partisan, felt as a partisan, and spoke as a partisan. He always sided against the mass, and for the few; and I am not disposed, for one, to give much credit to what he says in regard to his opponents. Go to the British Parliament, and take the speeches of her great statesman and orators, and tell me whether the friends of liberty would be willing that the speeches of their opponents should be taken as true history in regard to their character and objects. And I presume that the followers of Mr. Jefferson would hardly be willing that the speeches of their opponents should be brought up and arrayed against them as true evidence of their character.

As to Fergusson's Rome, from which the gentleman quoted, I apprehend a pensioner of the British crown, whose business it was to slander and misrepresent the friends of freedom in his own country, would naturally be disposed to give such a view of Roman affairs as would always put the people in the wrong. He also quoted from a translation of Livy.

Who was Livy? Did he write for the toiling millions? No, sir. He wrote for those who had the means to buy his books; and he wrote as a partisan. For the same reason that those who wish to do justice to the friends of liberty in England are not willing to be guided by Hume as an author, for the same reason, they should not be willing to take implicitly everything that Livy says in regard to his opponents. I do not desire to take up the time of the Convention; but, if they will permit me, I will read one or two authorities to sustain the position I have taken. I have in my hand, sir, the second volume of Neibhur's History of Rome; and if the gentleman will hereafter turn to the 124th page, and carefully read the chapter entitled "The Agrarian Law of Spurius Cassius and his Death," he will there ascertain the origin of the "Land Laws" of Rome. I have not time, sir, to read any extracts from it. He seems to think that Arnold quoted Neibhur, and Neibhur, Arnold, to sustain each other. In this he is greatly mistaken. Not only these authors, but Heeren Schlosser, Savigny, Wachsmuth, each and all sustained the position I have taken. I have before me a history of Rome translated from the German of the latter author, and I hope the Convention will excuse me for reading from it. It is an extract from the laws of Licinius Stolo, usually called the Licinian law, by modern authors called the Agrarian law. It is as follows:

"The common land ager publicus, of the Roman people shall be strictly ascertained and defined in its boundaries. Such portions of it shall be reclaimed by the State as may have been taken possession of by private persons without authority." p. 72.

Now, sir, do we not see that this regulation has reference not to the private property of individuals, but to the public lands which had been conquered from the different tribes of Italy by the valor of the plebeians. Again, sir, on page 73, in the same regulations, we find the following:

"Such portion of the public land over and above five hundred jugera, as are in the present possession of individuals without authority, shall be divided amongst all the plebeians in lots of seven jugera, as property."

Now, sir, this is all there is of the celebrated agrarian law. It had no reference whatever to private property, but was a regulation effecting the distribution of lands which belonged to the republic.

Gracchus simply insisted upon the enforcement of a law that was already in existence, and for doing this, he and his brother were both put to death by the patricians. He never advocated taking away one man's property and giving it to another. The more this subject is investigated, the more will the truth of history be vindicated, and of that I am fully satisfied.

I ask pardon of the Convention for having taken up so much of their time with a matter which is rather personal to myself, and perhaps not very interesting to some of them.

Mr. OWEN. If there be one single vote which I have given upon this floor, or which I may yet have to give up to the day when this Convention shall adjourn, in regard to which I am sure that I am right, it is the vote that I shall cast against the indefinite postponement of this section as reported by the committee on rights and privileges. If there is one vote which the people of the State will heartily approve, it is, I am convinced, this vote against postponement. If we reject this section, what is it that we are rejecting? Is it homestead exemption? Not at all. We are rejecting the principle incorporated in our statute book; the principle which, as the gentleman from Gibson reminded us, has been gathering strength from year to year. The gentleman from Putnam himself admits that it has. He expressly told us that the principle of exemption is ever increasing in favor. Then, when we reject the section, let us not conceal from ourselves that we are rejecting a great principle heretofore recognized among us by law—heretofore approved by the people of the State. The gentleman from Putnam confesses that the principle is a just and proper one; nay, that the present law does not go far enough. Why, then, shall not such a principle, politic in itself, already sanctioned by our people, be incorporated in the Constitution?

All just and good things, he says, need not go there. But is not this important enough to find a place among Constitutional provisions? Is there a single right which the poor man values more than this, that there shall be set apart for him beyond the reach of legal process, a small amount of property as security against absolute want; so that in case of sickness or other sudden misfortune overtaking him, the last article of furniture in his little cabin shall not be subject to seizure and sale?

This section is reported by the committee to come in immediately after the article on imprisonment for debt. Twin brothers are they; and they ought to stand together. What is the abolishing of imprisonment for debt? It is a declaration that the privilege of the debtor to the enjoyment of liberty shall not be encroached upon merely because he is a debtor. What is this exemption? It is a declaration that not the person only, but the necessities of life also, shall be sacred from the legal clutch of the creditor. Let us not make an unwarranted distinction in this matter. Shall we make of the one of these principles a sort of fugitive, at the mercy of the changing winds of unstable legislation, while we erect the other into a permanent constitutional provision?

The gentleman from Putnam has said he doubts not that the incorporation of this principle into the new Constitution would go far to produce its rejection. He might say this if he were speaking of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Huntington. He might argue that the people are not prepared for the fixing of the amount of the exemption at five hundred dollars. But there is no such question; and not the slightest risk of endangering the result of our labors.

All gentlemen, of course, have a perfect right to take their own course; but I suggest to those who are about to go for the indefinite postponement of this principle, to consider how such a vote may be construed. We have already voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Huntington. We have already put that down. Shall we also vote down the principle which recognizes the right of the debtor to the benefit of some exemption; for example, of the present hundred and twenty-five dollar law?

Not only is that exemption right in itself, but the proper place for it is in the Constitution; there by the side of its kindred principle, the abolition of imprisonment for debt.

What danger, what inconvenience or impropriety can there be in inserting it? Is it not worth the space occupied by three lines to declare the principle, that a creditor shall not follow his debtor to utter ruin? shall not take from him his last bed, or from his wife and children their last morsel of food? Is this not worthy of a small space in the Constitution? I repeat it, sir, there is not a vote that will more certainly be approved by the people than the vote against the indefinite postponement of this section.

MR. GORDON. I hope that the motion to postpone this subject indefinitely will prevail. And as considerable time has already been devoted to the discussion of the question, I shall not trouble the Convention to listen to any speech from me. I simply desire to state the reasons which will govern my vote. It is admitted that the State Legislature possesses ample power to exempt any amount of real and personal property from seizure and sale under execution for debt. If, therefore, a majority of the people of the State desire that there should be a homestead exemption, they can, by applying to the Legislature, procure the passage of a law for that purpose. But it is mainly because I believe that a majority of the people do not favor such a law, for if it were otherwise they would ere this have obtained its passage, that I am opposed to the adoption of any such provision into the Constitution. The gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) has stated that there is a deep seated and strong opposition to a homestead exemption in his county. That is not the only place where opposition to the homestead exemption exists. I know that there is a strong opposition to a homestead exemption in the breasts of thousands of the voters of our State. If, therefore, we incorporate a provision of this kind in the Constitution, we may expect thousands of votes to be cast against its adoption, that would otherwise be cast for it. As far as I am individually concerned I am in favor of a homestead exemption; but it is because I do not wish to be instrumental in incorporating in the Constitution that which I believe a majority of the people are not in favor of; that I shall vote for indefinite postponement, in order that the whole matter may be left where the framers of the present Constitution very wisely left it, viz.: to the discretion of the Legislature. I hope therefore that the motion will prevail.

MR. PEPPER of Crawford. As has been remarked, sir, this debate has taken a very wide range. It has been an interesting debate, and I would not now say anything in relation to the question under consideration, were it not for the amendments that have been offered, and the various forms and changes through which the measure, in its true sense, has passed.

I agree with gentlemen that this is strictly a legislative matter, and that there is sufficient power now given to our State Legislature to pass such laws upon the subject as may from time to time be necessary, so that if we refrain from acting upon it altogether, the people may, through the Legislature, if they choose, at any moment, procure the passage of just such a law as we propose to prescribe to them, or as their interests may demand. It strikes [me that this is the true position to take upon a question of this kind—a question strictly legislative in its character.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the will of the people, in this matter, demanding a provision for homestead exemption to be inserted in the Constitution which we are about to frame. I propose for a moment to notice this point. In the last annual message of Governor Dunning he recommended to the Legislature the passage of a homestead exemption law, and says if it should fail to meet with encouragement, then he hopes that this Convention will place the matter beyond legislative control.

Well, sir, the democrats were then speaking through their Executive, on this thought to be popular question. The whigs, unwilling to be outdone—unwilling that the democrats should steal their thunder on this popular question, as was then thought,—met in this Capitol and passed a series of resolutions, among which is the following:

Resolved, That the exemption of a homestead, or its equivalent in personal property, from forced sale, for debts contracted after the adoption of the new Constitution, would be a measure of policy and humanity—that it would be in consonance with our republican institutions—that this Government owes protection to the wives and children of its citizens, and that a home for innocence and infancy is demanded alike by the impulses which operate upon the human heart, no less than by the teachings of the Divine Law—that such a provision in our Constitution would tend to repress, in this country, that fatal abuse so long existing in the systems of the old world, overgrown land monopoly (the fruitful source of bloodshed and attempted revolution)—that it would create a spirit of true independence in the political action of the masses of the people, and prove the means finally of perpetuating the wise, just, and glorious institutions of our beloved country. Adopting the language of Mr. Jefferson, we declare, "Our national independence will never be complete till the homestead of the citizen shall be secured against the misfortunes incident to human life."

And, with the permission of the Convention, I will read a short extract from the message of Governor Dunning, on the same subject. He says:

"Believing that the interest and welfare of our country demand greater security to the families of a large and respectable portion of our unfortunate fellow-citizens, who are often overreached by the superior knowledge and cunning of their fellow-men, or become embarrassed in their pecuniary affairs by the vicissitudes of trade, it is respectfully recommended that such a change be made in our execution laws (to operate prospectively) as will exempt from execution and sale, in favor of any resident defendant and his family, a specific number of acres of land, or a specific amount in value; in all cases to include the homestead, or so much thereof as it will embrace. The details of such a law are left to the better judgment of the General Assembly. Should a law embracing this humane principle not meet with favor at the present session of the General Assembly, I trust that before the next assembling of the People's Representatives, this principle will become a Constitutional provision, thereby placing it beyond the power of unfavorable legislative action."

I refer to this message and resolution for the purpose of showing what was thought by politicians to be public opinion less than twelve months ago. Each political party tried to excel the other.

Both parties adopted it as one of their cardinal principles, and urged that the same may be engrafted in the amended Constitution. An appeal was made to the people to sustain the principle of homestead exemption; they were called upon to act. They did act, and what was the result? If we can judge correctly from the feelings of delegates in this Convention, representing the whole State, they decided in a voice not to be misunderstood, against placing the details of this proposition in the organic law.

The gentleman from Hancock has very earnestly contended that this homestead exemption should be incorporated in the Constitution, and placed beyond the reach of the Legislature. And I recollect that only a few days ago he eloquently argued that another subject, more fundamental in its nature than this, should be left to the Legislature. I concurred with him on that occasion, and adhere to the same doctrine now. We are told that the people will not reject the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock, exempting not less than five hundred dollars from execution.

It may be, sir, that if the homestead exemption be incorporated in the Constitution, the people may adopt it for the sake of the other provisions contained in it; they may be prevailed on to swallow the bad for the sake of the good that accompanies it; but it does not follow that, if they could vote upon each proposition separately, they would sanction such a measure.

The gentleman from Laporte, if I understood him, in the course of his remarks last evening, asserted that a course of policy which requires a man to pay as he goes, should be the true doctrine of this progressive age. If a man pay as he goes, where is the necessity of a homestead exemption? If he did so would there be any chance of the sheriff selling him out of his home?

But, sir, it is contended here that men will be moral, virtuous and patriotic if they have an interest in the soil. Who pretends to deny the right of any man to have an interest in the soil. It is the privilege of every citizen to acquire, possess, and enjoy property. It is also one of our republican principles that we shall be amenable only to our Creator for the exercise of our religious duties. Laws were not made for the honest, but for the dishonest. The honest man needs no law but the law of conscience, which is higher than all human laws. You cannot give a man a conscience by any law that you may enact. The principle comes from a higher source than the supreme power of the State. Kent, in reviewing the history of Rome, and of other ancient and modern nations, in reference to the subject of acquiring and possessing property, does not as gentlemen on this floor who advocate the homestead principle, seem inclined to do, come to the conclusion that property makes a man more patriotic. It does not make him love his country better. Sir, when "grim-visaged war put on his wrinkled front," when the call to arms was sounded throughout the land, a few years since, who first unfurled the American flag and marched under it to the seat of battle? Was it the man who possessed his thousands, the man who owned large real estate, that made haste to avenge his country's wrongs in a foreign land!

I admit there were many honorable exceptions. But of whom constituted the majority of those who rushed to the rescue of the country? Sir, I ask gentlemen if those foremost in the ranks were not men who owned no real estate, not a foot of land and but little personal property? And yet we are told on this floor, that property endears man to his country, that unless he is the owner of real estate, he is not to be trusted in the affairs of government to the same extent as the man who can boast of wealth. Sir, this is not so. I hold that property makes a man no more virtuous or patriotic than he is without it. It should form no test of merit, further than its influence is used for noble purposes. I am sustained in my position in regard to the effects and influences of acquiring and enjoying property, by Chancellor Kent. In the second volume of his Commentaries he uses the following language:

"A state of equality as to property, is impossible to be maintained, for it is against the laws of nature; and if it could be reduced to practice, it would place the human race in a state of tasteless enjoyment and stupid inactivity, which would degrade the mind and destroy the happiness of social life. When the laws allow a free circulation of property by the abolition of perpetuities, entailments, the claims of primogeniture, and all inequalities of descent, the operation of the steady laws of nature will of themselves preserve a proper equilibrium, and dissipate the mounds of property as fast as they accumulate."

Continuing the same subject, he says:

"Liberty depends essentially upon the structure of the government, the administration of justice, and the intelligence of the people, and it has very little concern with equality of property, and frugality of living, or the varieties of soil and climate."

Here, sir, we have it from good authority that equality of property is impossible and against the laws of nature—that liberty does not depend upon equality of property, but upon the administration of justice and the intelligence of the people. Leave the channels of acquiring and enjoying property open, alike to every person, and you will have a free and prosperous people.

Chancellor Kent comes to these conclusions, as I have said, after a review of ancient and modern history on the subject of property and its influences. Gentlemen tell us that the principle of a homestead is right, and hence it should be engrafted on the Constitution. Make it a fixed rule, place it beyond the control of the Legislature. Now, sir, it does not follow that because a principle is right it should be affirmed in the fundamental law. Not at all. There are a thousand principles right within themselves, which daily govern life, liberty, and property, which are not found in any written Constitution.

If a man steal your horse, it is right he should be fined and imprisoned. If he commit murder, he should be punished according to the offense, but does it follow that these and the whole calendar of crimes, shall be written in the Constitution? Clearly not.

You might swell the Constitution to a size large as the Revised Statutes of your State, and then not contain one hundredth part of the principles, right within themselves, but which properly belong to the common law and the statute.

Sir, I would not be understood to say that I am opposed to the principle of exemption. By no means. I am for having a reasonable amount of property exempted from forced sales on execution. This is right—humanity demands it; and I will be the last man to oppress the poor and unfortunate. I am willing that the debtor shall have just such exemption as the interests of his family demand. Not an amount that will make the debtor feel that let what may come, he is provided for, even at the suffering of his creditors—not an amount that will make him lazy or shiftless, but an amount fully sufficient unto the day of his absolute need.

But can we determine what exemption will be right for the next ten years? Sir, I take the ground that $125 exemption is, at this time, sufficient. But five years from this time it may not be half enough. And as we still increase in wealth, so property will become comparatively higher in value, as money becomes more plenty, and it would consequently become necessary to exempt a still larger amount of property for the benefit of the unfortunate debtor.

Therefore, sir, it appears to me that it would be wiser to leave this matter to the Legislature, to be regulated from time to time as the condition of things may require.

But, gentlemen seem to be afraid to trust the Legislature with the regulation of a matter which it is their exclusive right to control. Sir, it is an insult to the intelligence of the people to say that this subject cannot be regulated by them through their representatives.

Whenever such a law is demanded, it will be speedily adopted, and in just such form, exempting such amounts as the wants of the country require.

I am prepared to vote, first for the indefinite postponement of the section—not that I am opposed to the principle, as originally reported from the committee, or to the section as it stands amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Allen, but because it is wholly a legislative matter, and ought not to be made a part of the organic law. But if it be not indefinitely postponed, I am prepared to vote for it in its original form, leaving, as it does, the amount to be exempted and the details of the law to the sound discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. FARROW said—

MR. PRESIDENT, I feel reluctant to detain the Convention, but I cannot reconcile it with my sense of duty to let the present discussion close without presenting my views upon this important provision that is proposed to be ingrafted in the Constitution of Indiana. The section now under consideration proposes to secure to the debtor the necessary comforts of life, free from forced sale under execution for debts hereafter contracted. This, sir, is one of the provisions that I advocated before my constituents as being entitled to a place in the amended Constitution, and I present it to the consideration of the Convention as being one of the inherent rights to which every man that lives is fully entitled. It is true, sir, that this right was never recognized by any of the older Constitutions of the States of this Union, and for a long time the laws that were enacted under those Constitutions were as far from recognizing that right as the Constitutions themselves; for even in this land of boasted liberty the privilege of the creditor to strip his debtor of the last dollar of his property, was not so much as called into question, but was actually sanctioned by public opinion; but, in addition to that, he was authorized by law to shut him up in prison as a punishment for being too poor to pay his debts. All this, sir, was considered, at the time to which I allude, to be in accordance with the Constitution under which such laws were enacted. But, Mr. President, most of the Constitutions under which such desolating laws were made, remain as they were, so far as this right is concerned; yet, sir, legislation on this subject has been greatly changed. So far as I know, there is not a State in this Union but what has not only abolished imprisonment for debt, but in addition to that, have exempted at least as much property from execution as was deemed necessary to keep the family of the debtor from becoming a public charge. All this has been done, sir, by legislative enactment, without any Constitutional provision on the subject. Now, sir, if, without any sanction by the Constitution, the Legislature may act on the subject of exemption according to the interest of the creditor or debtor, as their interests may at different periods prevail, is it not necessary for this Convention to establish a permanent rule by which all future Legislatures shall be governed on this important right of man. Mr. President, I do not ask this Convention to secure to the debtor a certain amount of property, either real or personal; but I do ask them to recognize the right, and that right too, upon which all other rights depend, that is, sir, the right to live. Would it not be a contradiction to say that all men have the natural and inherent right to acquire and possess property, and at the same time refuse to secure to him, by Constitutional provision, the common comforts of life, which is all the section under consideration proposes to do? Then, sir, if we definitely postpone this section, will we not virtually say to succeeding Legislatures, you have no right to interpose between creditor and debtor in the slightest manner whatever; but if the creditor should require it, let the debtor be stripped of his last dollar and reduced to the necessity of feeding his family by his daily labor; and if the avarice of the creditor is to be further gratified, let him place an officer at the door of his debtor to wrest from his hands the meagre earnings of the day, which may consist only in a small amount of provision to feed his starving wife and children.

Mr. President, the Convention may establish this principle, but the good sense of the people never will approve that decision. Sir, we only ask that the principle upon which our own Legislature have acted when they, from time to time, have exempted property from execution, may be recognized in the Constitution, and then the people will, through their representatives, use that right as to them may seem best to accomplish the object for which it was conferred. I trust, sir, the section will not be indefinitely postponed.

MR. RITCHIEY. I had not intended to say a word on the subject, but as I find that the Convention is disposed to go very thoroughly into the debate, I wish to occupy their attention for a few moments, while I give the opinions that I entertain in relation to the subject.

Sir, this is one of the questions that were not discussed during the canvass of last summer, in our county, but I am willing to say this, that I am anxious to see the principle, just as it has been presented to us from the committee, incorporated in the Constitution. The privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life should be recognized by wholesome laws. And, sir, the debtor should be protected. I believe this policy should be encouraged.

It has been practiced on by our government over and over for a number of years past. There is now an exemption to the amount of $125. The universal sentiment of the country is that that sum is not sufficient to afford the necessary comforts of life to any family in the country. Deprive any member on this floor of all but $125 worth of property, I ask you if he can enjoy the comforts of life!

Sir, my heart was moved a short time before coming to this Convention, by a conversation that I had with a poor man of my county. He was deeply indebted to several individuals, and among the rest to myself. I was talking with him about his embarrassments. He said he was discouraged—he had no longer any heart to labor. The moment he got any property in his possession his creditors came and took it under execution. He said he sometimes wished he was dead. I felt there was a great deal of force in what he said. The gentleman from Putnam has remarked that it is far easier to keep a homestead than to acquire it. Sir, I admit it. Under the law as it is at present, it is impossible for a poor man to acquire a comfortable home. Every thing he acquires is taken from him, and he is subjected to perpetual poverty. Sir, the poor men of this country are the men who are blessed with large families, and $125 will hardly shield them from the inclemency of the weather.

I hope, sir, that the principle of exemption may be ingrafted in the Constitution just as it was presented to us by the committee, and that the Legislature will then act upon it, and guarantee to all the citizens of Indiana hereafter the privilege of being secured in the possession of such an amount of property as will afford to them the comforts of life.

Mr. READ of Monroe. When I look around and see the impatience of the Convention to come to a vote, I certainly shall not inflict upon it a speech.

I cannot, sir, consent to bluff down the great sentiment of humanity contained in the section before us, by voting its indefinite postponement. If it were even my wish, to prevent its adoption into the Constitution, I would from respect to the principles it contains, rather move that it be gently laid on the table.

Are we prepared to go backward, and say to our future Legislatures, to the people of Indiana, and to the whole world, that there ought to be no exemption of property from execution? For one, I cannot say that. Nor, sir, am I prepared to vote a homestead exemption into our Constitution. All that can be said of home—its blessings and its comforts—I most deeply feel. Home—there is not another word in our English language so sacred—so full of meaning—so fraught with associations dear to the human heart. It is a Saxon word—and it contains a Saxon idea. The home—the separate home for every family—is an idea innate in our very race. No form of socialism can ever take root among Americans. It is foreign to all our habits and feelings. According to all our sentiments, there is nothing more miserable than to be homeless. When you have said of an individual, he has no home, you have said that which represents a condition of great misery. But when you have said of a family—that family has no home—it is a picture of extreme and heart moving wretchedness, such as will bring tears to the eyes of any child of our families, to whom it may be presented.

Sir, had I my will, I would gather up the families from the garrets and the cellars and the hovels, of our towns and cities, and I would give them a home, without money and without cost, in the woods and the prairies of our vast western domain. [Cries of “consent, consent.”]

I am willing, sir, to adopt the reported section. I am willing to say “the privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome law.” Yes, sir, the word “comforts,” another good old Saxon word, the synonym of which is not found in any other language, I am willing to retain.

This leaves the whole to the Legislature. It leaves them to retain the present amount of exemption—to increase it—to accommodate it to the varying circumstances and sentiments of society. This is as far as I can go. I speak but the voice of my constituents, and as I think of the whole Southern portion of Indiana, when I say, they are opposed to a homestead provision for the Constitution. The farmer, the man in moderate circumstances, those commencing the business of life—I speak in general terms—oppose it, as forming a part of the organic law.

The average wealth of all the families in Indiana is but about eight hundred dollars to a family. If you estimate our population at a million, the families of the State will be one hundred and sixty-six thousand, and the whole property of the State as exhibited upon the tax duplicates being but one hundred and forty millions of dollars—something less—the amount to each family, will be in round numbers as I have stated. A homestead of five hundred dollars, is then equivalent to an abolishment of all process for collecting debt, as to a majority of the people of Indiana. This is surely going too far in the organic law; further, as I think, than the public sentiment of the State will warrant.

On the other hand, there is no disposition to harass and destroy the debtor, and to punish him and his family as felons.

I hope, sir, the section will be retained, and pass as reported, without change or modification.

Mr. SHERROD. I desire, sir, to make but a single remark. I think that it would be well for this Convention to ask the question whether this is a Convention of the people of Indiana assembled to revise and alter the Constitution of the State, or whether by some hocus pocus we have converted ourselves into the Legislature of the State. Now, sir, we are far advanced in the eighth week of the session, and what have we done? And what are we doing? We are consuming the time of this Convention day after day, in discussing what? The details of a homestead exemption, a matter that clearly belongs to the legislative department of the government. Well, sir, if we are to continue in this course we had better adopt a code of laws, and abolish the Legislature altogether. ["Consent."] Now, sir, as to the practical details of homestead exemption, or rather as to the principle, it is beautiful in theory, and may work very well in practice; this is a matter yet to be tested by the people of Indiana. So far as concerns the people whom I have the honor to represent, I did not discuss the question before them as a Constitutional provision. I spoke of it, when I spoke of it at all, as a matter of law that belonged exclusively to the legislative department of the government.

Now, sir, this Convention has expressed an opinion upon this question, and what is that opinion? It is that it is not advisable to adopt the practical details of a homestead exemption in the Constitution that we are about to make. Then, sir, I ask the Convention if it is necessary that we should continue to consume the time of this body in discussing this matter, inasmuch as they have expressed a decisive opinion upon the point. I am in favor of recognizing the principle of homestead exemption. Thus far I go, and no farther; leaving it to the Legislature of the State, leaving it to the people of Indiana, to adopt, at any future time, if they should deem it proper and expedient to do so, a homestead exemption, and carry it into practical operation by legislative enactment.

Mr. MURRAY said: I will not detain the Convention more than five minutes.

I rise only to express a hope that the subject will not be indefinitely postponed. I hope the question will be taken directly upon the measure, and that it will be determined upon its merits. For what purpose, Mr. President, have we met here? Is it not to provide for the welfare and happiness of the people of the State? Yes, sir, in this short sentence, is comprised the whole sum of our duties. And, sir, is it not for the welfare and happiness of the people that every family should have a Home?

Does not wisdom and beneficence make it proper they should have a permanent home? Would it not relieve society of many burthens, and greatly increase the comfort of community? If so, then why neglect the opportunity of securing a measure through which they can acquire and permanently possess a home?

Mr. President, we are the only power that can make this provision permanent. Why shall we not do it? If we leave it to the Legislature it will be subject to be enacted, and again repealed by every successive Legislature. At least such has been the history of it. Sir, this subject has obtained the consideration of our Legislature in some form for many years. Sometimes they have given a family a Bible and a spinning wheel—perhaps half a dozen sheep to boot; sometimes they have given them fifty dollars, sometimes a hundred, and sometimes a little more. The measure has been changed as often as the wages of Jacob, when he was with Laban, serving to obtain his wife. It has been like "keeping the promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope."

Sir, it has been remarked by an honorable member, that, in his opinion, $125 was enough for a family? Well, Mr. President, I can only say, I envy not the gentleman in his sentiments. Why, sir, a tolerably good pair of horses, would be worth $125. Suppose then a debtor selects under the law, a pair of horses to plough a rented farm. The sheriff sells, under the legal forms of the law, all the rest of the goods. We are a law abiding people, and the poor debtor submits perhaps, without an audible murmur. His wife and children can lay upon straw, and by diligent labor the husband can earn them bread.

But, sir, suppose a thief in the night steals his horses. His plough is left in the furrow, and his means of support is taken from him. How then can he support his family? Again: suppose when the sheriff leaves him in possession of the small pittance of personal property, that his family is stricken down with sickness. A few days of the freezing chills and burning fevers, that prevail in our new country, leaves their attenuated forms blanched and prostrate. The physician's bill, and attending expenses, has swallowed up his $125, and like Job he is as destitute as when he was born. Shall we reduce men to such extremities, when we have the power to relieve them? Is there any member of this Convention that would like to try the experiment of living on $125 with a family to support? I think not.

Mr. President, it has been said by another honorable gentleman, that the prudent and industrious need no protection, and that the improvident would not profit if he had more than the law now provides for him. Sir, if that gentleman had looked but a little over the field of his experience, he would have seen many prudent and industrious persons, who by unforeseen events, have been reduced from affluence to poverty—from abounding in the comforts of life, to the most painful penury. And if he should look a little into the vista of the future, he might see many more doomed to similar disappointments. Sir, the instability of human affairs exposes the most prudent and deserving to many misfortunes.

Another honorable member has said that an interest in the soil—a home secured by law, would not make a man feel a deeper interest in his country's safety and welfare; and alludes to the homeless soldiers of the Mexican war.

Sir, Americans are always brave; but how many of those gallant fellows had homes in expectancy? Did not their country promise them a home? Did not the hopes of enjoying domestic bliss, around the bright fireside they expected to receive as the reward of their bravery and their toil, nerve their arms in the day of battle? True preferment is the bright star at which the soldier grasps. "A soldier's wealth is honor." But this does not preclude his love of home. Sir, the soldier, whose body is made a breast-work for his country's defense—whose bosom is open to the hissing bullet, the booming cannon, and the flashing steel, deserves well all the immunities, and all the rewards, a grateful country can bestow. Sir, how many of those brave men are this day in penury? Shall we not provide for them a home.

Sir, I regret exceedingly that my favorite amendment has been rejected, but I still cling to the little that is left in the report, as the shipwrecked sailor clings to a floating plank. I was deeply imbued with compassion for the poor, when I was yet a little child. Will the Convention allow me to relate an incident. ["O yes! O yes!"]

Well, sir, one morning, before the hour of school, my father took my tiny hand, and led me to the house of woe. The mirror was clothed in drapery, and the family in mourning. The body of my father's friend, (Col. R——n., of Johnstown, N. Y.,) had lain three days unburied. An execution had been levied on his corpse. The Sheriff, whom I knew, for he too was my father's friend, sat in the corner of the room. My father approached him, and after a few words, the Sheriff presented him a paper, which I afterwards knew to be a bond. My father signed it; the Sheriff retired, and the family fell upon my father's neck with tears of gratitude. That day my father's friend was buried, and from that day I have never ceased to mourn, with a burning sympathy, for the afflicted and destitute debtor.

I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that even this shadow of a substance, that is left to the bill, may become a provision of the Constitution. If we do not provide for the poor and the laborer, the sure possession of a home, it is to be hoped that the clause which is left, urging the subject upon the attention of the Legislature, may have the effect, at no distant day, which I so ardently desire.

Mr. KELSO. Mr. PRESIDENT, having been for some time necessarily absent from the deliberations of the Convention, I am greatly at a loss to understand the different propositions, as they severally come before us; I should therefore be glad to know, sir, what it is, that is proposed to be indefinitely postponed. I will ask the Secretary to read the proposition.

The Secretary accordingly read the section and the pending amendment.

Mr. KELSO. Then, sir, as I understand the proposition, it is to ingraft into the new Constitution, a provision that the Legislature, shall pass laws exempting to the citizen of Indiana a home for his family exempt from execution, of an amount not less than four hundred dollars. That, in substance, is the proposition that is asked to be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. OWEN. I will suggest to the gentleman that the motion to postpone indefinitely, if agreed to, applies not only to the amendment of the Gentleman from Hancock, but to the section itself.

Mr. KELSO. I am aware of that fact, sir. Now, sir, we are told here, and by men who act and talk as though they were in earnest about it, that the people do not expect us to do any thing about this matter, it being a subject for legislative action exclusively. Now, I ask, is there a single question that can be brought before the Convention in which the people feel a more deep and abiding interest, than they do in this question? I say there is not. Then why should it be left to be disposed of by a body whose action is continually varying, who pass a law to-day and repeal it to-morrow, whose action is as changeable, as that of a public meeting, to which a question might be submitted in which the interests of the people of Indiana are concerned. There is no good sense in it. What is the proposition? It is to secure a homestead to each citizen of Indiana. Then why not make it certain, why not make it permanent? Why not fix a minimum below which it shall not descend.

One gentleman is alarmed for fear he may be considered a mere member of the Legislature, instead of the Convention. [A laugh.] Why, I can remember the time when the gentleman was proud to be a member of the Legislature, and I ask him, is it descending from our duty to fix land-marks for the Legislature, beyond which they shall not travel? I say it is our duty to fix upon a minimum in this case. We are dictators to the Legislature. That is the very business for which we have been chosen. It is our duty to say to them: Thus far you shall come—Here you shall stop. It is our province to settle this matter permanently. If four hundred dollar's worth of property be too much, make it less. If it is not enough, make it greater. I maintain it is not a dollar too large. What is the intention of it? It is to secure homes for the citizens of Indiana. How are you to do it? Can a man make a living for himself and family from less than twenty acres of land? The fair average price of land in Indiana is ten dollars an acre. He will then pay two hundred dollars for his land. Can he erect a respectable log cabin for less than two hundred dollars? Well, sir, there you have four hundred dollar's worth of property—little enough, in all conscience. I say, let us fix upon a sum, certainly not less than four hundred dollars, below which the Legislature shall not go.

My young friend from Crawford, (Mr. Pepper,) who seems extremely patriotic, talks very eloquently about those of our citizens who went into the Mexican war, not being landholders. That is true enough, and another thing is certain, that neither he, nor I, went to Mexico. But let him be assured, that those who went, went upon the assurance that they should be rewarded with land for their services; and let me ask him, if he believes that the company which went from his county, were so neglectful of their duty, as to lose sight of their reward, or as to go without being well assured that they should receive land enough for a home.

Mr. GIBSON. The first companies that went, had no assurance that they would receive any land.

Mr. KELSO. But the first that went got their land, nevertheless. The American people are too just, to allow services to be rendered them without making adequate compensation.

I maintain that we cannot do better than to fix a certain amount, below which the Legislature shall not go. But the gentleman says, that the democracy have spoke through their Governor, in favor of homestead exemption, in 1848, and that the whigs, not being willing to be outdone, even appealed to Holy Writ, to Divine authority, in favor of the insertion in the State Laws of such a provision. Now he asks the gentleman, have the people sanctioned this? He does not know whether they have or not.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I answer the question by saying, that we must judge of the sentiments of the people by the action of their delegates on this floor, and of their representatives in the Legislature. If the Legislature of the State, or if members on this floor are in favor of the measure, then we may presume that the people sanction it.

Mr. KELSO. Now let me say, in reply, that there has been no direct action upon the question, and the gentleman takes upon his shoulders, all that he is able to stagger under, when he says, that the people have ever, either directly or indirectly, decided the question. Sir, it does not follow that because some of us got here by accident, without expressing any opinion upon this question, that the people are opposed to it.

I say that more than one-third of the delegates to this Convention never cheaped before their constituents about the Homestead Exemption; it was not made a leading question in one-half of the State.

I feel safe in saying that the question was not made among the candidates for this Convention. The democratic convention to nominate candidates in my district for delegates, decided in favor of Homestead Exemption. But all the candidates who expressed an opinion upon this subject, expressed it in favor of the measure. Now we are told that we are not to legislate in regard to this matter. I ask you what part of legislation it is to say that there shall be a Homestead Exemption created by law, which shall not be more or less than so much. That is all that we propose to do; there we stop.

But the gentleman from Orange, (Mr. Sherrod,) talks about the details. Who has asked that the details shall be fixed? That is a matter that properly belongs to the Legislature. But, I ask you, if it is improper, or out of place to say, there shall be certain provision made in favor of the citizens of Indiana, not less in amount than a given sum. Certainly that would not be improper.

Well, sir, a certain learned gentleman from Putnam has taken it upon himself to say, and no doubt he believes it, that such a provision would injure the poor man. Now I cannot see the force of this argument. It may be owing to the dullness of my apprehension.

Mr. STEVENSON. I was referring to the amendment of the gentleman from Huntington which makes no provision for the protection of those who have no land.

Mr. KELSO. I thank the gentleman for his explanation. I have no disposition to do him injustice. But as I regard this matter, it is an exemption that may be held in property of any description. Well, now, if a man chooses to vest his means in real property, can he, for a less sum than four hundred dollars, provide a home for himself and family? I thought that once a Senator from Dearborn county made as fair a calculation as could be made, regarding the expense of a family. He certainly made it as low as possible, and it would require $164 to provide a family of six persons with the personal goods necessary for house-keeping. For my own part, I think five hundred dollars little enough.

If you hold out encouragement to a man to provide for himself a home, you will improve the character of that man. He feels a pride that the government has provided a protection for him, and he would be ashamed to do a dishonest act. His family is sure of support; he feels safer; and then he goes perseveringly on, and will succeed in paying to his creditors the debts he owes.

My friend from Putnam took occasion to bring this proposition in comparison with the old bankrupt law. I was against that law in all its stages, and I confess that two-thirds of my opposition to it was before I understood it as I should have done. I would like to have the gentleman point out to me now the serious evils that have resulted to the people of this union from that law. It has been denounced as an odious law, and perhaps justly so. But I ask gentlemen to point out the evils that have flowed from it. Many a man lost a just and honest debt, and many a man was relieved from the payment of a debt that he never could and never would have paid. Many a man was placed upon a level with his creditor, who would, without that law, have been crushed; having no means by which to pay, and no encouragement to try to pay. And hundreds of men who were relieved by that law, have since paid at least a part of their debts, which, if the law had not been passed, they never could have paid. By its operation the means were placed within their reach. It has certainly done much good, and if you take the trouble to examine the matter, you cannot point out any injury that it has done without, in some quarter, finding a corresponding good. So if we can get the outline in the Convention, so as to compel the Legislature to do their duty in the matter, and it prove no worse than the bankrupt law, I say let us ingraft the provision, and let us make it strong and plain. Let us try it. It has been justly remarked, that perhaps the amount proposed might be proper at present, but that it would be improper hereafter—that the amount that would be proper to-day would not be proper next year—that it might be too great or too small. That is true, and I reply in this way: we ought to have judgment enough to know what is a fair minimum.

A VOICE. No, we have not.

Mr. KELSO. Well, then, we had better go home. We ought, I say, to have judgment enough to be able to fix a fair and a reasonable minimum, which would not be too high, and leave the Legislature to improve upon it as circumstances might demand. Then let us fix upon that minimum, leaving to the Legislature the power to increase the amount, but not to diminish it below the sum fixed in the Constitution. The Legislature will be composed of men like us, and they will resort, perhaps, to subtleties, as we do; they will come, instructed as we have, and give pledges to their constituents. I am not for shrinking from responsibility. I dispise a political coward, here, or elsewhere. What I do, I do boldly. I am for taking my share of the responsibility. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment, and then for the amendment as amended, and then for the section.

I once more insist, sir, that we should put this matter beyond the possibility of doubt as to what amount a man of family (or a woman) shall be entitled to, under all circumstances, which shall be exempt from execution.

Let us fix upon such amount as will enable the citizen to support his family, such an amount as will place them reasonably beyond the pale of suffering. By so doing, you increase the wealth of the country by encouraging improvements in the country. You thereby make a freeholder of every good citizen in your State; you thereby increase the revenue of the State by increasing the value of the taxable property therein, and you furthermore give stability, character, and permanency to the community generally.

Every step you take in this matter (if prudently taken) will tend to the advancement of the general welfare of your community, instead of retarding its progress.

There never will be such a thing as a true system of credit in Indiana, until that credit shall be given with reference to the moral honesty of the debtor, instead of looking to the amount of his property. If you credit the property of the debtor instead of his honesty, he may, with great propriety, leave you and the officers to make the money out of his property, provided you can find enough of it to do so when the debt falls due. And you certainly have no right to complain if you get that to which you gave the credit. But let me remind gentlemen that this thing called property is fluctuating and uncertain, and so long as you keep the law as it now is, so long will men resort to the practice of smuggling and covering up at least enough of their property to keep their families from suffering. And who, I ask, can blame them? Self-preservation is the first law of nature; and it is written, that "He who provides not for his own household, hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

As the law now stands, exempting $125 worth of personal property, it is regarded by many as being exceedingly liberal to the debtor. But, sir, is it not as essential that they shall have a home, a shelter to protect them from the peltings of the pitiless storm, as that they shall have food and raiment? It certainty is. And we now invariably see the poor man, who is oppressed with debt here, so managing as to put something secretly into his pocket, and with the slender pittance of $125 worth of property, which is protected, he leaves the State and goes elsewhere, to seek an assylum from the importunities of his unrelenting creditors, and we thereby loose many good citizens; whereas, if we would fix upon a reasonable amount as a minimum, and make the thing permanent and certain, we would elevate the character of our community, the character of our State, and greatly advance the general prosperity of both.

On motion by Mr. FOSTER, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the subject of the exemption of property from forced sale for debt.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not rise, sir, for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to define my position with regard to this question. It is a subject, sir, that was not discussed at length in my county, but it was always adverted to in every stump speech that was made; and there was no diversity of opinion among all the candidates, the successful or the unsuccessful. A large majority of the people of that county are opposed to a Homestead Exemption in toto, and even the minority are divided in opinion. Some are for making it a part of the organic law; others are for making it a part of the statute law. But when I say a large majority were opposed I do not mean the commercial part of the community. So far as my observation extends, those engaged in commerce are favorably disposed; but it is the yeomanry, the bone and sinew of the land, that, or as some gentlemen say, the musket bearing portion, that are opposed to this provision being incorporated in the organic law.

They argue, that even supposing the law is a good one, if made a part of the Constitution it will remain there forever; if the result of our labors should be approved by the people, the presumption is, that it will last as long as we last, and perhaps for succeeding generations. And I think, with them, that a law of this kind should be a statute law, because then the details can be arranged and altered as often as there may be a necessity for altering them. The existing law provides that when a mechanic builds a house, he has a lien upon it for the amount of his claim for his labor; but suppose, for argument sake, that an individual has a lot worth fifty or an hundred dollars, and employs a mechanic to build a house for him, and that by the labor of the mechanic the property is increased in value to the amount of five hundred dollars, and that when the work is completed he turns round and says to his creditor, "Sir, the law declares that I shall have five hundred dollars' worth of property exempted." What sort of propriety is there in such a law?

Well, sir, would it be right to go into detail in regard to all these matters, in a law that is to be permanent? I think not.

We have been carried into Greek, and Roman, and Egyptian history, in search of precedents for a homestead; but, with deference to the opinions of the learned gentleman who has taken this course, I think it must be apparent that a great portion of his research was irrelevant, and cannot be made to bear at all upon the issue.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) has described home and its endearments in most eloquent and glowing language; and I subscribe to all that has been said in this vein. The gentleman's remarks brought up anew to my own mind the recollections and reminiscences of by-gone days. When I have sailed upon the pathless ocean, I have myself often thought of home; and the first toast of a warm-hearted sailor, assembled over a glass with his comrades, is always, "To our sweetheart's and wives."

The gentleman from Huntington, also, was very eloquent in his remarks upon this subject. His speech was, as I think, one of the most chaste and exquisite productions which has been delivered upon this floor. I subscribe to all the positions he assumes, in principle; but I cannot concur with him in making the Homestead a part of the Constitution.

I know, sir, that gentlemen are anxious to have this question decided. For myself (as I have before remarked) I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to define my position. I have no hesitation in saying that the people of my county are opposed to what, in common parlance, is called the Homestead Exemption. Accordingly I shall vote not for postponement; but I shall vote against the amendment, and in favor of the original section as reported by the committee.

Mr. DOBSON. I do not rise to make a speech, but merely, in common parlance, to define my position. [A laugh.] I wish to say to the friends of the section, which confers no Homestead Exemption, that so far as the section goes I am willing to retain it. I would not like to have it encumbered with amendments, so that we would be compelled to vote it down, because that would be such an indication as might prevent the Legislature from acting in the premises at any future time. For this reason I hope the Convention will take the section just as it is. I am satisfied that the true policy, for the majority, is neither to postpone nor to amend. This is all. I merely rose to state my understanding of the case, and why I shall vote against postponement.

Mr. PRATHER. I am satisfied that the minds of members are pretty well made up. And concurring, generally, in the remarks of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson), I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN. I call for a division of the question. There are two propositions embraced in these amendments.

The Convention refused to divide the question; and the yeas and nays being demanded, ordered, and taken upon the motion to lay on the table, the Secretary reported—yeas 82, nays 43—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

YAYS.—Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Borden, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Crumbacker, Colfax, Davis of M., Dick, Farrow, Garvin, Gregg, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Ristine, Shoup, Smiley, Spann, Thomas, Walpole, Wheeler, Wunderlich, and Yocum—44.

So the amendments were laid upon the table; and the question recurred upon the engrossment of the section.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I wish to offer a small amendment, which I think will not be objectionable. If the friends of the section desire not to change it, I am not inclined to elicit further debate. I hope, however, that my amendment will be concurred in. It is as follows:

“Amend by inserting after the word ‘debtor,’ the words ‘if the head of a family.’”

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe (in his seat). The question is on postponement.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman’s amendment is not in order.

Mr. WALPOLE and Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Hancock.

Mr. WALPOLE. I propose to amend by inserting the following immediately after the word “property,” in the third line:

“Not less than three hundred dollars.”

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I demand the previous question.

This demand was seconded by the Convention, and the main question was now ordered to be put.

The PRESIDENT. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) and the next question will be upon the engrossment of the section.

The yeas and nays having been demanded, ordered, and taken upon Mr. Walpole’s amendment, the vote was announced—yeas 42, nays 87—and recorded as follows:

YAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Borden, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dick, Garvin, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Murray, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Ristine, Shoup, Spann, Thomas, Walpole, Wheeler, Wunderlich, and Yocum—42.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The yeas and nays being also demanded, ordered, and taken upon the engrossment of the section, as reported by the committee, the vote was announced—yeas 116, nays 11—and recorded as follows:

YAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—117.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bright, Carr, Fisher, Gibson, Hall, Hovey, Logan, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, and Zenor—11.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on to-morrow.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the consideration of the second section of the report of the committee on rights and privileges, and pending amendments, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary then read the section as follows:

SEC. —. Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and laws shall be passed, securing to them, under equitable conditions, all property, real or personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterwards, by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was then read by the Secretary, as follows:

"Every married woman shall have the right to the exclusive use and benefit of all real estate and every interest therein of which she may be seized or possessed at the time of the marriage, or of which she may become seized or possessed at any time, during coverture, by devise or descent, or in any manner other than by gift from her husband or in fraud of third persons; and laws shall be passed, securing to the wife, on equitable principles, the use, issues, and profits of her separate property, and a just interest in her husband's estate, in the event of the dissolution of the marriage contract by the death of the husband or otherwise."

Mr. NAVE's proposition to amend the amendment was also read by the Secretary. It is as follows:

"No law shall be passed whereby the property owned by a feme covert at the time of her intermarriage, or by her acquired subsequent thereto, either by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or otherwise, shall ever be taken for the debts of the husband, contracted before or after said marriage."

Mr. BLYTHE's amendment to the original section, by way of substitute, was also read in the following words:

"The real and personal property of women, whether owned before marriage, or afterwards acquired, by purchase or gift, devise or descent, shall be and remain secured to them under equitable conditions by law."

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment, by way of substitute, to the original section, proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Blythe).

Mr. BASCOM. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

This motion was agreed to, upon a division of the House—affirmative 60; negative 36.

So Mr. BLYTHE's amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. RITCHEY now moved to lay the section and pending amendments upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered upon this question.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) that the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Blythe) has, I believe, an amendment which he desires to offer to this section, and I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion till that can be done.

Mr. RITCHEY (in his seat). I propose to test the strength of the section at once.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon Mr. RITCHEY's motion and reported—yeas 65, nays 64—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Biddle, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, May, Morgan, Newman, Nofsinger, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoenover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Stevenson, Tague, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hitt, Hovey, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Miller, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Wheeler, and Wiley—64.

So the report was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the order of the day, is the last section of bill number four.

The section was read as follows:

"Laws shall be passed securing to women now married the right to all property hereafter to be acquired by them, in every case in which such married women, in conjunction with their husbands, shall file for record in the Recorder's office in the county in which they reside, a declaration duly attested, expressing the desire of the parties to come under the provision of such laws."

The PRESIDENT. This is the second reading of the section, and the question is, shall it be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. BLYTHE. I move to strike out the section and insert the following:

I do not design, Mr. President, either to renew or prolong the discussion which has taken place here on this question. My object is simply to explain the effect of the amendment which I have offered. Gentlemen will doubtless remember that during the early part of the debate on this question, a statute passed in 1847 was referred to, and once or twice read. By the terms of that statute the real property of married women is protected from seizure and sale for the debts of the husband. The effect of that statute is, that the real property of the married woman remains secured to her as her separate property.

The object which I had in view in offering the amendment which I offered some days ago to the second section of this article, was simply to extend the provision of the statute of 1847 to the personal as well as to the real property of the wife. I was led to this from listening carefully to the arguments which have been adduced, both for and against the section, as reported by the committee. I gather from the arguments of the author of this proposition that he did not seek to effect anything more than what I seek to accomplish by my amendment. The committee, however, in framing the section used language which, in the opinion of many gentlemen of the Convention, would necessarily lead to consequences much to be regretted—consequences which I am sure could not for a moment have been contemplated, either by the author of the proposition, or by the committee reporting the section. I gathered, also, from the arguments on the other side of the question, that those who opposed the proposition founded their opposition mainly, if not entirely, on the peculiar language of the first two lines of the second section. They said that we were about to introduce a new principle—one which would disrupt, perhaps entirely destroy, our domestic and social relations. For the purpose of avoiding any effect of this kind, it occurred to me that a simple declaration of right, by which declaration the personal and real property of the wife would be secured to her, was all that was necessary. With that view I drafted the amendment which I offered some days ago. The present one is substantially the same, differing only in its phraseology, and seeks to accomplish this purpose, and this only—that the personal as well as the real property of the wife should be secured to her. This amendment, therefore, I regard as being free from that class of objections which have been urged against this section; and I will only say further that I am at a loss to conceive of any good reasons, any valid arguments which can be assigned for its rejection. I am prepared, however, to listen to any objection which may be urged against it, and if I can be satisfied that it is obnoxious to serious objections, I will withdraw it. But until I am so satisfied I must insist upon its passage.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "gift" the words "other than from the husband in fraud of his creditors."

Mr. BLYTHE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) that the words "equitable condition" would cover the whole ground. However, to avoid delay or debate, I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the section and the pending amendments on the table, and the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered on the motion, they were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bascom, Biddle, Bowers, Bright, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gootee, Hardin, Howe, Huff, Logan, Mathis, Morgan, Nofsinger, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Tague, Walpole, Watts, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—34.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimby, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Mr. President—87.

So the motion to lay the section and amend on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN. I move to amend the amendments by adding the following:

"And upon the death of the husband, the wife shall succeed to the rights of the husband in the use of the estate, both real and personal, during her life, when the husband may die without making a will."

I think that would be a very suitable provision. No one can deny at any rate that it would be good for the widows, and would give them another chance to get married. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Vanderburg will not be embarrassed by any extraneous matter, and that the Convention will proceed to take the vote on the real merits of the question involved.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Rariden, it was rejected.

Mr. HALL. This subject has undergone a great deal of discussion, and I do hope the Convention will not do injustice to the question embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Blythe); but meet it fairly. As so much of the time of the Convention has already been taken up, I trust that this subject will not be further postponed, but that the Convention will proceed to vote upon it. I believe that at least two-thirds of the Convention are in favor of the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BARBOUR moved so to amend the section as to provide that the husband should not be liable for the wife's debts.

The amendment was rejected, and the section was then ordered to a third reading.

COUNTY AND TOWNSHIP OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the order of the day is report No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to consider this report section by section, or to take up the sections altogether.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Section by section.

The first section of the report was then read as follows:

"There shall be elected in each county by the qualified electors thereof, a sheriff, coroner, recorder, county auditor, county treasurer, and a clerk of the circuit court, at the time and places of holding elections for the members of the General Assembly. The clerk, auditor, and recorder shall each continue in office four years, and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified. But no person shall be eligible to the office of clerk, recorder, or auditor more than eight years in any term of twelve years. The sheriff, coroner, and treasurer, shall each continue in office two years and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified. Provided, that no person shall be eligible to the office of sheriff or treasurer more than four years in any term of six years."

Mr. WOLFE proposed to amend the second line by striking out the words "county auditor." He would merely remark that there were a number of counties in this State, of which his own county was one, that did not elect county auditors, and which did not require them. He could see no reason why an office of this kind should be made to depend upon a Constitutional provision, and he thought that such a provision, so far from having a tendency to recommend the instrument to the favor of the people when perfected, would only endanger its final ratification. The people in the several counties could have county auditors if they desired them without a Constitutional provision, and to make such a provision, would only render it necessary for each county to have a county auditor, whether the people of such county desired to have such an officer or not. He knew that there were many counties that did not wish for such an officer, and could do very well without him.

It was a very different thing with a county surveyor. Under the old Constitution no provision was made even for a county treasurer, and he very much questioned whether the people would not reject the new Constitution entirely on the ground of so many new offices being created. It was his candid opinion that the people never contemplated the immense augmentation of State and county officers for which gentlemen seemed so anxious to make provision. If gentlemen would reflect for a moment they would remember that this was a new office. It was only created in the year 1841. The people get along very well without county auditors, and he was satisfied that in many counties they could get along without them yet. The business was generally done by the clerks of the circuit courts, for which they receive a salary of perhaps not more than seventy dollars per annum. Was there any complaint in these counties when the business was thus performed? Certainly not. Now in the thinly populated counties, he was of opinion that the people could get along very well without county auditors. The business could be done as well by the clerks of the circuit courts, and it was not necessary to create more officers. The people whom he represented did not send him there for any such purpose. The whole object they had in view was to economize—to make such alterations in the general scheme of government as would save expense, so that the State might be able to discharge the great debt which hung so heavily upon her, and be placed in that enviable position which she occupied a few years ago.

Mr. NAVE. The speech of the gentleman from Sullivan has had one good effect, and that is to induce me to move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WOLFE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered and taken with the following result:

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—91.

NOES.—Messrs. Badger, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Dick, Dobson, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Hitt, Logan, Mather, McFarland, Moore, Mowrer, Pepper of Ohio, Schoonover, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Trimble, and Wolfe—29.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. LOCKHART. In the absence of the chairman of the committee on the practice of law and law reform, and the organization of courts of justice, I will move to strike from the section the words "clerk of the circuit court."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley observed, that he was aware that the committee on the organization of courts of justice had reported a section providing for these clerks. The matter, however, was not referred to that committee, but to the committee on county and township organization, and in compliance with that reference they had reported this section. He hoped the motion to strike out would not prevail.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the words "Clerk of the Circuit Court," it was decided in the negative.

Mr. PRATHER moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "recorder" in the fourth line, the word "surveyor."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BASCOM proposed further to amend the section by inserting after the word "treasurer" in the eighth line, the word "surveyor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN said, that before offering an amendment which he desired to make to the section, he would state that with regard to the State officers, the judges of the circuit courts, &c., he was prepared to favor the idea that they should all go out of office: but not so with the county officers until at the expiration of their respective terms. He would therefore move to amend the section by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent those persons now holding office from serving the time for which they were elected under the present Constitution."

The people hardly anticipated when they called this Convention, that the Convention would legislate these men out of office. He was favorable to the judges going out of office and submitting to a new election; but he saw no reason why the county officers should be legislated out of office. He thought it would be productive of less difficulty if those persons now holding county offices were permitted to remain in them until the expiration of their respective terms; and then the provisions of the new Constitution could operate upon them. This seemed to him to be reasonable and proper. He should not further detain the Convention except by saying that he hoped this amendment would be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) it might be very proper that the Convention should discuss what officers should remain in office, and who should go out, but he did not think that this was the proper place in which to make the amendment. There ought to be a general provision to cover the whole ground.

Mr. READ of Clarke moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, with the following result:

AYES.—Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hovey, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, May, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—61.

NOES.—Allen, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Steele, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, and Wunderlich—62.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN. This vote tests the principle, and I am satisfied to withdraw the amendment, if gentlemen think it can be put in a more appropriate place.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HALL. I voted against this amendment not because I am opposed to it in principle, but because I think this is not the proper place for it. There will be a miscellaneous article with a number of sections, in one of which I think this provision might be made.

Mr. BORDEN. The chairman of the committee on miscellaneous subjects informs me that this subject is before them. I believe that it is usual in a schedule to provide for matters of this kind, and the Convention having expressed its willingness to retain these officers, I would like to have the privilege of withdrawing my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment cannot now be withdrawn.

Mr. KELSO maintained that this was both the proper time and place to dispose of this amendment. There were seven offices, all of which the Convention were willing to retain, and it would be better to decide upon retaining them now than to leave the whole question open to the last, when some gentlemen would go for retaining one class of officers and others for retaining another class. There are members who would be willing, for instance, to retain the officers of the judiciary and not county officers, and vice versa. Were it thus left to the last, it would inevitably create confusion, and a compromise would most probably have to be effected. Now was the time to retain all those officers which they had determined to retain.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I wish to say a single word on this provision. It does appear to me that notwithstanding the usual good sense of my friend on the right, (Mr. Kelso,) he has mistaken the correct view of this subject. I take it that there will be a general provision upon the subject reported, and at that time I think we should have a general vote, and not quarrel and fight upon the different sections, and in regard to the different officers. I am satisfied that that would be the proper mode and the proper time to decide on this matter. From the indications which we have already had, it is evident the vote will be a close one, and gentlemen may not perhaps yet have thought over the subject sufficiently to make up their minds. Now let us look at this matter for a moment. The new Constitution, if it should be ratified, will not likely go into effect until a year from next August. Next August another third of the Clerks will have to be elected, and their term of office is seven years. Before the new Constitution can go into operation there will be two elections, and the officers elected under the old Constitution will be running beyond their term. If we calculate to do equity and justice to the people of the State, we will take such a course as will make them all elective. So far as the Clerk of my county is concerned, I know that he cares nothing about it; but then it will not be so throughout the State. It is of much more importance to continue judicial officers in office, than any county officers; but suppose it was possible that we could have a Supreme Judge in every county of the State, what then? This is a very important office, and would you continue the incumbent in it for life, according to his tenure. I think the country expects that when we put into the Constitution the several officers, we will put them all in at the due time and make them all elective. It occurs to me that this is the correct mode in which to act, and is what I believe the people will expect of us.

Mr. BROOKBANK. I do not rise to occupy much of the time of the Convention, but I must say that if there is any subject in which I feel interested more than another it is this one now under discussion. It was admitted to be a principle worthy of being acted upon, that all officers should be elected by the people. These county officers who have been elected so recently, are a fair expression of the popular will, and this expression of their voice should not be cut off by any wholesale action of this Convention.

The gentleman last upon the floor says, that it would be an act of injustice to those who might desire to seek office, that the Clerks elected for seven years should hold their offices for the remainder of their term under the new Constitution. What man is there whose services would be worth having, who would be willing to accept an office under the old Constitution, for the term of one year? No man. Now notwithstanding this attempt to commit a kind of wholesale manslaughter upon these officers, I maintain that in every department of the public service you will obtain better men, and give more satisfaction to the people, by permitting those who are elected by the people to hold their offices for the full term for which they were elected.

Mr. RITCHEY. I do not rise to prolong the discussion, but I would ask members if they do not think there will be enough to break down the new Constitution when its adoption comes to be voted upon by the people, without enlisting against it the opposition of every office holder throughout the State? These men have influence, and the Convention may rely upon it that that influence, in conjunction with other influences, will be thrown into the scale against the new Constitution, if any such limitation is adopted here. I am fully of opinion that any officer elected under the old Constitution should serve out the full period of time for which he was elected; and I can see no necessity for us to step out of our way to abridge the term of service, either of a Clerk of a circuit court, or a recorder, or any other officer, when we could just as well let them step from the one Constitution to the other.

Mr. NAVE. It is growing dark, and as there appears to be no probability of getting a vote on this question to-night, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The Convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 27, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. CARY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the President of the State Bank, and also a communication from the Cashier of the State Bank, in relation to the several branches of that institution.

They were, on motion, laid on the table, and fifteen hundred copies of each were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAGUIRE presented a petition from citizens of Marion county, respecting the privileges to be allowed to negroes.

On his motion it was referred to the select committee that was raised for the purpose of reporting upon this subject a few days ago.

On motion of

Mr. THORNTON, the petition which he had presented on a former day, in relation to this subject, from citizens of Floyd county, was taken up and referred to the same committee.

Mr. BORDEN moved that the rules be suspended, to enable him to introduce a resolution that when the Convention adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet on Friday morning, at 9 o'clock.

The Governor, he observed, had issued his proclamation, setting apart to-morrow as a day of thanksgiving; and notice had been given in the several churches of the city that divine service would be performed. He thought, therefore, there would be no disposition on the part of the Convention to do business on that day.

The rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, being the section in relation to the exemption of the property of debtors, on its third reading.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to re-commit the section to the committee on rights and privileges, with instructions to insert the words, "of the head of a family."

I presume, said Mr. Pepper, it is not intended to make this provision—which, I believe a majority of this Convention are decidedly in favor of making, for the benefit of the debtor,—to secure the debtor a certain amount of property. I think it is not intended to make the provision extend to transient persons, or to young men, or, if you please, to old bachelors, if they be not heads of families. I am in favor of the provision, provided it be amended as I propose.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley addressed the Convention. [His remarks will be published hereafter.]

Mr. GIBSON moved the following as a substitute:

"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to exempt from sale on execution, a reasonable amount of property, proportioned to the necessities of the debtor."

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson,) it was not agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to amend the instructions so as to exempt the homestead of the debtor from forced sale on execution, to such value or extent as the Legislature may prescribe.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KELSO. I believe, sir, that the motion is to re-commit the section with instructions, and the question will first be upon the instructions moved by my colleague; by which he proposes so to change the section as to apply its benefits only to heads of families. I wish to enlarge those instructions, sir. I wish so to amend as to give the Legislature the power to exempt a sufficient amount of real or personal property, or both, for the benefit of the debtor, as the Legislature may think proper. Now, take this section as it reads at present, and if it does not come a little nearer meaning nothing at all, than any section that has yet been reported, then I am greatly mistaken. In our present Constitution there is nothing said upon the subject; yet no one will deny that the Legislature has the power to pass an exemption law, for the benefit of debtors, and such laws have been passed ever since Indiana has been a State. There certainly is no additional power conferred by this section. It is as follows:

"The privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life, shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted."

And there is the whole of it.

This principle has always been recognized in every christian country, that debtors should be allowed the necessary comforts of life. I believe there is no law anywhere which declares that if a man does not pay his debts, he shall be starved—that he shall have no shelter. In countries where they do punish for non-payment of debts, they shut up the debtor it is true; but they furnish him with sufficient food and lodging. This is the case everywhere—there is no exception. Well, this is a matter that should be regulated by wholesome laws, just such as the Legislature may choose to pass—no more and no less. And our Legislature has exercised this power ever since we have been a State. They have from time to time passed wholesome laws upon the subject of property exemption, commencing by exempting fifty dollars worth of property, and increasing the amount from time to time, until it has reached the amount of one hundred and twenty-five dollars in personal property, which, as has been said by the gentleman from Ripley, is barely sufficient to furnish the necessities of life for a small family, making no provision for a home of any kind.

A MEMBER. It is not the family, but the debtor that is provided for.

Mr. KELSO. I know this provision is for the benefit of the debtor, and therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is perfectly correct and proper. I cannot believe it is the intention of this Convention, that it shall be considered compulsory upon the Legislature, to provide for a man who has no family. It never was done in Indiana but once, and then it was through mistake, and the law lasted but a single year. The wording of this provision is doubtful, to say the least of it. And this is a question of all others, in regard to which, our meaning should be clear and unmistakable. I do not say the Legislature might not so construe the section, as to make provision for the heads of families only. But it ought to be put beyond a doubt.

I hope, therefore, that the section will be referred, with instructions and amendments as I have proposed.

Mr. NILES. I need not say, Mr. President, that it is with reluctance I rise to utter another syllable on this subject. It is not my disposition I trust, to quarrel at all with the action of this Convention. Whatever shall be the final result of their deliberations, I trust I shall be found ready to acquiesce cheerfully in it, at all events to attribute to every gentleman on this floor integrity of purpose. But I must say that it has occurred to me, there has been manifested in regard to this, and a somewhat kindred question, the most remarkable inconsistency. There is apparently, an inveterate feeling of opposition—an honest feeling I admit—on the part of a majority of the Convention, to the idea of placing beyond the reach of the sheriff, the home which shelters the unfortunate debtor, because, gentlemen think it is to tie up the property of the State, and embarrass commerce, and credit. On the same day when this measure is voted down, comes up a provision in relation to the rights of married women, protecting from execution and even from the control of the husband, half the property of the State. It is at once laid on the table—several gentlemen who like myself do not favor the measure, voting, as a matter of courtesy, against the motion. Within one hour from that time, the same measure, in substance, is introduced again, and without a moment's delay, under a sudden impulse, and without debate, or the eyes and noses being called, it is forced through. It is made as far as the action of the Convention can make it, the law of the land. For I need not hesitate in the belief, from the disposition that is generally manifested, when action has been once taken, to adhere to it, that it will not be re-considered.

One reason, sir, why I am opposed to that measure as a Constitutional provision is that it may aid ultimately to defeat the homestead exemption—a measure which comes in conflict with no dictate of reason, no principle of benevolence and no great law of order. But with reference to the section relating to the rights of married women, I am by no means certain, but that in its spirit, and in its silent, unseen and ultimate influences, it may come in in conflict with that great law of our being, so often announced at our marriage festivals—"and they twain shall be one flesh"—"what God hath joined together let not man put asunder." That is a law upon which the happiness of our race most largely depends and which can never be violated without disastrous results. I am by no means satisfied from the experiments which have been made in the civil law countries, that the condition of women among us would be elevated by any similar provisions. I am by no means certain, but that such a measure would tend to build up and perpetuate large estates, or but that it would prove useful—if useful at all—mainly to the rich. I am not certain but that we can see something of such a result in our large cities, and in Great Britain, brought about indirectly by means of conveyances in trust. The protection of the wife's property from execution, for the husband's debts is one thing; the building up of separate interests and estates, is entirely another. I cannot, of course, in this incidental way, set myself right upon this question. But I must confess that it appeared to me like strange inconsistency for this Convention on the same day, in effect, to reject the principle of homestead exemption and adopt the section upon women's rights. I am aware that any appeals at this moment, will be unavailing, and perhaps I ought not to have risen to make even these remarks.

Mr. READ of Clark. As this debate has taken such a wide range and occupied so much of the attention of the Convention, I do not feel inclined to indulge in any lengthy remarks upon the subject. But, sir, I would say in the first place, that I have always been in favor of a liberal exemption from execution.

The journal of the Legislature, for the last twenty years, in both branches of the Legislature, will show that I have always been in favor of granting liberal exemptions.

My great objection to referring this matter, as I have stated on former occasions, is, that it will endanger the adoption of the Constitution. Pass the Homestead Exemption law, the women's rights law, and the negro law, which the masses of the State object to, and where will be your Constitution? The Constitution will be rejected after the Convention that formed it has cost the State some eighty thousand dollars.

I am opposed, sir, to this subject being ingrafted in the Constitution, because the whole country is so decided on the subject. In the southern portion of the State the people are almost unanimously opposed to it, while in the northern portion of the state they are in favor of it. In view of this State of things, then, why not leave the question to the discretion of the Legislature?

During the last eight or ten years the subject has been up every year before the Legislature, and it has always, with scarcely an exception, been voted down. In the House last year, there was a pretty close vote upon it, I believe. Having these facts before us, sir, would it not be inexpedient to ingraft this article in the Constitution, thereby endangering its acceptance at the hands of the people?

I recollect the period, sir, when the exemption amounted only to sixteen dollars; but it has increased in amount from time to time, until it has now reached the amount of one hundred and twenty-five dollars. And if this progressive ratio is allowed to go on, can we say what it will be twenty years hence? Doubtless more than is just or necessary. We ought, sir, to leave the matter with the Legislature, and allow them to act as they may deem necessary under the circumstances.

A number of States have passed the Homestead Exemption law, and several have repealed it from considerations which they deemed weighty and sufficient.

I am opposed, sir, to referring this matter, and prefer that we take action at once upon it, and go on with our other business. On the ground that I have stated, I trust it will not be committed; not that I am opposed to protecting the honest labor of the poor, for I am with that class of our citizens heart and soul. I was raised from poverty, and I know how to appreciate their condition, and no man can say but that I have always been, as I always shall be, their friend.

I do not desire to detain the Convention; I am opposed to referring this question, and to placing the Homestead Exemption in the Constitution. If the people of the State require such a law, let them make their wishes known, and have them obeyed through the medium of the Legislature.

Mr. SHOUP. I presume this matter has been discussed as long as it is necessary. I therefore move the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention second the motion for the previous question?

The motion was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. Shall the main question be now put.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The main question is, Shall the section pass?

Mr. KELSO. I rise to a point of order. I desire, in the first place, to know whether the main question is upon the reference with instructions?

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman will refer to the rules, he will find that the previous question takes precedence of the motion to commit. A motion was made to commit the section with instructions. While that motion was pending, the previous question was called for, and it being seconded and the main question ordered to be put, the question now is, Shall the section pass?

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe inquired whether at this stage of proceeding the motion to commit did not carry the instructions with it?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has decided the question. Any gentleman dissatisfied with the decision can take an appeal.

Mr. KELSO. I feel so well satisfied that a motion to lay on the table is now in order, that I move that the instructions be laid on the table for the present. I will risk the issue.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move a reconsideration of the previous question. I voted for the engrossment of this section; but if it would be any satisfaction to those in favor of the Homestead to leave the question open for the present, I will go with them to lay this motion to commit with instructions upon the table.

The Chair decided that such a motion was not now in order.

The PRESIDENT. Is the gentleman from Switzerland desirous of taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. KELSO. I am.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said he thought that the motion to lay on the table was always in order, according to parliamentary law.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the appeal of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso). Before it is taken, however, he must send it up to the Secretary's desk in writing.

Mr. DOBSON (in his seat). Has the gentleman given security for costs? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALL. I have always understood, in parliamentary proceedings, that it is never in order to lay upon the table during the first and third readings of a bill.

Mr. Kelso here sent up his appeal in writing.

Mr. KELSO. In order that we may now decide the question so as to be governed on future occasions by our present action, I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays being demanded were ordered.

THE PRESIDENT. As many as are of the opinion that the decision of the Chair shall stand as the opinion of the Convention will, when their names are called, answer "aye;" those of the contrary opinion will answer "no."

The Secretary then proceeded with the call, and reported the following result—yeas 111, nays 8:—

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Bourn, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—111.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Bascom, Blythe, Clark of Hamilton, Hawkins, Kelso, May, Milligan, and Walpole—8.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurring upon the passage of the section, the yeas and nays were taken under the rule with the following result, yeas 108, nays 18:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—108.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Bright, Butler, Carr, Fisher, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Hall, Hovey, Kelso, Logan, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Read of Clark, Smith of Ripley, Terry, and Zenor—18.

So the first section of article 4 was passed, and was referred, as usual, to the committee on revision and phraseology.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the third section of article four, relating to the right of women now married, to hold property.

The question being, Shall this section now pass?

Mr. ROBINSON moved that the third section of article four be re-committed to the committee on rights and privileges, with instructions to amend by striking out the section and inserting the following:

SECTION.—All married women residing in this State at the death of her husband shall have the right to claim free, and discharged from his debts an amount of property not to exceed the sum of three hundred dollars, and one-half of the balance remaining after the payment of his debts.

Mr. ROBINSON said: When this question was undergoing a general discussion I was not present. The subject being of a very general character, and one affecting the interests of my constituents, as well as all other persons, I had intended to have given my views at the first opportunity afforded. But this being simply a motion of reference, the speakers are simply restricted to fifteen minutes, so that the limited time in which I will have to speak will not permit me to more than give the leading reasons which influenced me to prefer this amendment to that section which has been engrossed. And permit me to say I am as willing as any one on this floor to do ample justice to married women. I believe they are the most meritorious members of the partnership that is formed for life by the contract of marriage, and that much injustice is done to them in the majority of cases. I believe that the law of descent as it now stands does them gross injustice; indeed I believe it frequently reduces them almost to beggary and want, by taking from them nearly all the property left. This is wrong; and the section as it now stands, in my opinion, also does not grant to married women the equality to what I think they are justly entitled. The section as it is now proposed secures all property acquired by descent, gift, or purchase with certain restrictions; but in perhaps a majority of the partnerships formed in our State by marriage, at this time, the female seldom brings into the general stock anything more than a portion of personal property, and perhaps that personal property after being in use for many years during the existence of the husband's life is all worn out or disposed of. Take one then out of almost any number of cases that present themselves as things now stand, and the law absolutely secures them nothing. As I remarked before, the personal property brought into the family has long since been exhausted, or will be when the partnership is dissolved by the death of the husband. Then, sir, as the section stands, it would secure but little, so far at least as personal property is concerned.

I am opposed to the passage of the section under consideration not because I believe the married women are not entitled to the benefits it confers, but because I apprehend it will tend to produce discord, and engender bitter feelings between man and wife, to disturb that relationship which should be held sacred and kept free from everything calculated to make it unpleasant. We should correct the law of descent, thereby providing for the wife after the husband's death. How often, sir, is it the case, as a gentleman remarked, when speaking with reference to the question under consideration, and in reference to the amendment before the Convention, that under the operation of our law of descent that the husband dies leaving property of which the wife has only the right to claim one hundred and fifty dollars; with the balance being distributed according to the law of descent among the children, when the wife is under the obligation imposed on her by the feelings of a mother to raise and educate, and sometimes the property under the law of descent goes to some distant relation. It seems to me, sir, that you should secure to the wife the amount of three hundred dollars free and discharged from her husband's debts. That will be barely sufficient to meet the wants of the wife and mother at his death. For I hold, sir, that debts contracted during the existence of the partnership for the benefit of both should be held sacred, and always paid where there are any means for so doing, before any favor more than the sum of three hundred dollars is bestowed on the wife as provided in the amendment. After the debts of her husband are paid I think that the wife is, by every rule of justice and right, justly entitled to one-half of the balance of her husband's property after a full payment of his debts and cost of administering.

I offer my amendment, sir, because I believe it to be more appropriate, and because I think it will prevent discord in the private relations that exist between man and wife in many instances. If it should not meet with the approbation of the Convention, I can only say that I have done what I believed justice required; that I have endeavored to guard one of the dearest relations in life, and to secure at the proper time justice to married women in a way which is better calculated to secure peace and harmony in the marriage relation.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I wish to say a few words on the proposition of the gentleman from Decatur. If I could persuade myself to vote that anything pertaining to this subject ought to be ingrafted in the Constitution, I would be willing to vote for a portion of the instructions moved by the gentleman. I have been impressed, sir, long ago, with the opinion, that the provision made by our law for the benefit of widows, is altogether insufficient. It is by far too limited in amount to accomplish the object designed by the law. And I undertake to say that this proposition to increase the amount of property granted to the widow at the decease of her husband, will benefit a far greater number of females than the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, with all its boasted humanity, and, sir, without inflicting any of the evils resulting from that measure. The assistance thus given to the widowed female, by the law, (if it can give any,) will come to her aid at the proper time. If the law can properly discharge the property of a family from the lien of debts; if it can turn aside to perform an act of kindness—I know of no period when it is so much needed, as that in which a family is bereaved of its head and support. Then the labor and skill of the father no longer assists them, and the mother and children are left to their own resources.

It is then, sir, that aid is most needed—that some provision is necessary to support the family, until they have time to look around for new means of employment and subsistence. This provision, sir, will apply beneficially to all who have any amount of property, and will especially benefit widows whose husbands were of moderate circumstances, or whose affairs were embarrassed. But the section itself, which the gentleman from Decatur proposes to amend by substituting his proposition, can apply only to the wealthier portion of our people, and always, in every society, they must be comparatively few. But, waiving the objections which I made to it at another stage, on a moral ground, and the corruption of manners which it will cause, I desire to consider it in another aspect.

Sir, we are told much of progress and advancement, of the necessity of amending our Constitution in accordance with this boasted progress and advancement. Now, sir, a writer on the subject of government, renowned for his sagacity, advises statesmen that the purpose of amending a government is to reduce it again to its original principles, and not to depart further from them, unless the object be to adopt a government with different principles. I affirm, sir, that this advancement, which gentlemen talk so much about, with reference to this question, consists, not in a greater respect and tenderness or the rights of females—but arises from a greater appreciation of the consequence of wealth.

Sir, it is that wealth is an object of too much esteem among us, and we have an over-weening desire to secure it to our families and children. In republics more than in any other government, virtue and capacity must be the standard of public esteem. I will even say, sir, that a free government cannot exist upon any other basis. If we desire to perpetuate our institutions, we must seek to establish that state of morals, in which the man shall be accounted rich, who is wise and just.

Gentlemen have denounced the law of our fathers, which declared the unity and identity of husband and wife, which made the relation so sacred, that no human law could find any pretence for any separation of their interests, to be barbarous and inhuman. They boast of our superior intelligence and refinement. But I undertake to say, sir, that no people on earth are more indebted to the wisdom and virtue of their ancestors, than are the American people at this moment. I venture to say, sir, that we, in the high and heroic qualities which exalt and ennoble human creatures, do not surpass our ancestors. Sir, the heroic age has passed away, and we are reaping the fruits of the wisdom and unselfish virtues of our forefathers. I am willing to grant that, in some respects, we may be more refined, for some sorts of refinement are the offspring of leisure and wealth. But neither refinement nor wealth, is virtue.

Vice may be somewhat divested of its hideousness, if polished, but it is vice still; and thus veiled, is often more pernicious to society than vice in its native grossness. But I say, sir, that all this great movement in relation to this subject, is not because we have advanced in humanity or virtue, or because we have a deeper veneration for human rights, but because we have a greater respect for wealth—because wealth has an undue and improper degree of influence on our minds—we commit the character and persons of our daughters to the hazard of the husband's keeping, but will not venture that which we prize the most—her wealth. Sir, a great while ago, in an ancient republic, when it was proposed to one of its most illustrious citizens, that he should give his daughter to a man of wealth rather than to one, poor and virtuous, he said he chose a man for a son-in-law, rather than a fortune. This, sir, is the principle of a republic. Virtue must be pre-eminent in our esteem. Our laws should encourage this sentiment—not seek to eradicate it. The only pre-eminence which a republican people can properly recognize, is the pre-eminence of wisdom and virtue. To this standard our reformatory ought to be directed. In that society where virtue and wisdom is most honored, and held in the greatest esteem, there will be the strongest inducements to men to labor for such distinctions. The noblest civilization, the most permanent prosperity of man, spring from and rest upon such a basis.

Sir, men standing on the basis of equality are entitled to superior esteem, only because of superior merit. And with privileges there must always be corresponding responsibilities. If vice were equally meritorious as virtue, what human motive would there be to induce men to virtue. If to flee from danger were no discredit, and bravely to encounter it no honor, man would cease to be brave. If ignorance, idleness, and improvidence brought the same rewards as wisdom, fore-thought, and industry, men would cease to be wise and industrious. We cannot change the laws of nature as to these things. Man must be responsible for his actions; there is no escape from the penalties imposed by nature, for misconduct, either individually or politically. Now, sir, let us consider the principle of some; of our pretended reformatory—our progression toward equality, which is the grand principle of a free government. We are seeking to place property beyond the reach of the penalties which attach to improvidence or extravagance. We are not willing to trust it to the custody of those virtues by which it was acquired, but seek to secure it against all contingencies of conduct. Because wealth gives home a degree of consequence, we are aiming to make those who have it, secure in their possession, independently of their good or bad conduct. We are trying to place on an equal footing, folly and wisdom, idleness and extravagance—to entail on those who have it, the aristocracy of property—to give them privileges, and exempt them from the responsibility of their actions. On this principle, that privilege and responsibility should be inseparable, I opposed what is called the Homestead Exemption.

For, sir, I believe that we can provide no better law than nature's law; that wisdom, capacity, and industry shall have a higher reward than folly, idleness, and extravagance.

Now, sir, let us look at the fine picture of our improvements on the laws of our ignorant and barbarous ancestors. My friend here, before me, from Laporte, would secure, as a sacred and inalienable possession, the moss-covered cottage—no, sir, not moss-covered—he describes it as an ancient, time-honored castle, crowned with woodbine—fragrant with roses—where was gathered up all the refinements of taste, and the elegancies of wealth. This sacred possession, hallowed by so many holy associations, shall not be put in hazard by any improvidence, any extravagance of the husband. The payment of a debt, contracted to maintain this splendor, shall not jeopardize this holy place!

Then next comes the gentleman from Posey, with his humanity to the wife. All the property which she may, by any means, acquire, is also to be secure against any debt which the husband may contrive to contract. What else can this secure and happy family need? Why, sir, they need servants, that they may have leisure to cultivate their tastes, and refine themselves from the barbarisms entailed on them by their ancestors,—and behold, sir, the humanity of some other gentlemen provides that the poor negro shall be sold to them, that nothing shall be wanting in this happy group. This, sir, is the grand improvement we have made in our conceptions of equality—this the refinement which we so extol—this the love of freedom and devotion to humanity which we manifest!

But, sir, I am too old-fashioned—too anti-progressive—that I am opposed to these things. I hold it to be a true principle of government, that all men are to be responsible for their privileges—responsible for their actions. There are to be no exemptions—no artificial distinctions—no classes shielded by law—no position of place or power—no perpetuity of property, irresponsibly secured or maintained by law—but all are to have an equal and fair right to exert their faculties, and are to be subject to the penalties properly arising from their misconduct—entitled, also, to the rewards of their labor.

Why, sir, what is the objection against corporations? It is that they are invested with privileges, and are not made responsible for their acts—that the individuals composing them have the unlimited privilege of contracting debts, but their property is secured to them, and relieved from the responsibility of payment. Thus privileged classes grow up, without corresponding responsibilities. Sir, we seek to restore our political equality by abolishing these exclusive privileges—by requiring full responsibility. But these humane contrivances which gentlemen are progressing in, what are they but domestic corporations? These domestic corporations, sir, are authorized to contract debts for which their property is not to be responsible. Their property is to be secure against all misconduct. Idleness, extravagance, waste, sir, are not to put in hazard this sacred possession. I ask, sir, how do these domestic corporations differ in principle from the ordinary corporations which certain gentlemen denounce so vehemently. I say, sir, that these measures tend to build up exclusive privileges, and to divest individuals of all responsibility for their actions. They are based on a false principle—an undue regard for wealth, and too anxious a desire to secure it to the possession of those who have it. It is an attempt to exempt men from the penalty of their misconduct—to make wealth, not virtue, the standard of merit.

Mr. HOVEY said, I am friendly to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburg, (Mr. Blythe,) but think the language used will have a much broader effect than the gentleman intended. I think the words "purchase, or" should be stricken out of his amendment.

The word "purchase," as used in his amendment, would give to the wife the full control and use of all that she may make by her personal labor during coverture. Kent says: "All the modes of acquiring title to land are reducible to title by descent and by purchase, or, according to the better distribution of Mr. Hargrave, into title by act or operation of law, and title by purchase, or by the act or agreement of the parties. Whether the agreement be founded upon a valuable consideration, or be the result of a free and voluntary gift, the property thereby acquired is still, in the eye of the law, a purchase."—4 Kent, 374.

If I am not mistaken, the technical definition of purchase, as above explained, applies as well to personal as real property, and if so, I think it is clear that the amendment would give to married women the right to the products of their personal labor. I therefore move to recommit the amendment, with instruction to strike out the words "purchase, or."

Mr. BLYTHE. The effect of this motion would be to substitute a new principle in the place of the one adopted by the Convention yesterday. Will the Secretary oblige me by reading the instructions offered by the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson)?

The instructions were read as requested.

Mr. BLYTHE proceeded to say: My objection to that proposition is this—that it is upon another and an entirely different subject. I agree in opinion with the mover of these instructions, that our present laws regulating the descent of property, so far as the interest of the widow is concerned, are iniquitous. I believe that they ought to be changed; I believe, also, that, at the proper time, in addition to the section which was adopted by the Convention on yesterday, we may bring forward a section which will require that matter to be better regulated by the Legislature for the future, which I think ought to be done. Every gentleman who will take the trouble to compare the section, as adopted on yesterday, with the proposition offered by the gentleman this morning, will at once perceive the difference. This proposition relates only to the property to be held by the widow at the death of the husband, and it leaves the evil we complain of just where we found it; and we might as well have done nothing at all. That is the objection which I have to the proposition made by the gentleman from Decatur.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark), it seems to me, misapprehends the design and effect of the section which I offered yesterday. As I at that time attempted to explain, my object is to avoid altogether the evil consequences which many gentlemen suppose would inevitably follow from the peculiar phraseology of the section, as reported by the committee on rights and privileges. It is known to the chairman of that committee that I was opposed to that section, because I believed that it would lead to consequences not contemplated by the committee. And my object was, so to frame the section, as to accomplish what I supposed to be the intention of the committee, without incurring the hazard of injuriously affecting the marriage relation.

With regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Hovey,) I will say that I am willing that any amendment shall be made to the section which will more effectually relieve us from the difficulty which he apprehends. And if I thought that the word "purchase," as used in the original section, would bring us within any danger, I would move myself to strike it out. But let us look at it for a moment, and see whether that is likely to be the case. The section, as originally reported, reads in this wise:

Now, gentlemen who listened to the debate on this subject, will recollect that it was on the peculiar phraseology of these two lines, that the argument of those who opposed it was constructed. Now, on the other hand, what do I say in the section which I offered yesterday? I say that they shall have secured to them, under equitable conditions by law, their real and personal property, whether acquired by purchase or gift—other than from the husband in fraud of his creditors—devise or descent. Now it is to the word "purchase" that objection is made. If there is any force or validity in the objection, I am willing to strike the word out. But let us reflect on this for a moment.

How may a married woman now acquire property? Not by purchase, in the common every day acceptance of that word; for she cannot be a party to a contract. But there is a technical signification of the word; and in this sense it includes every mode of acquiring property, except by descent. When property is given, or bequeathed by will, the person to whom it passes is said to take it by purchase; he is a purchaser. In this sense of the word, a married woman may now become a purchaser. Her legal disability to acquire property by purchase, in any other modes than those by which she can now acquire it under the law, it is not proposed by this section to remove. We wish her legal position in this respect to continue just what it is.

Such being the mode in which a married woman may now acquire property, does the use of the word purchase, in this section, confer upon her the right to acquire it in any other way? If the word had no more enlarged signification, than that which attaches to it in every day use, then, perhaps, such a result might follow. But the manifest intention of this section being only to secure to married women their property, so that it shall not be subject to execution for the husband's debts, and so that the husband shall not be permitted, without the consent of the wife, absolutely to dispose of it, but have only the control and use of it, in maintaining and educating the family, it seems to me impossible that it should be construed so as to mean, that a married woman may make a contract, where by the law she is now incapacitated to act at all. So long as the law relating to the wife's capacity to contract, remains as it now is, her right, under this section to acquire property by purchase, will be construed with reference to it.

It is not our purpose to bring about a separation of the interests of husband and wife, to destroy the feeling of dependance which impels her to look up to him for protection and guidance, or to weaken in any, even the slightest degree, that intimate and confiding affection which is the chief virtue and excellence of the union.

The reason why there is greater security in this section than in the one reported by the committee, is, that I have used words about the meaning of which, when construed with reference to the existing statute or common law, there can be no doubt or uncertainty. But if the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) will show me that the phraseology of this section gives to the wife the power to make a contract where she now has not that power, I will agree to the instruction which he has proposed.

I cannot suppose that any gentleman who will examine the whole section as it stands in all its connections and legitimate bearings, can come to the same conclusion with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that there is any danger at all that the relations between husband and wife will be changed. It leaves them, in my estimation, just as they now are. At the conclusion of the section are the words "equitable conditions by law," and the details of the whole subject are left with the Legislature.

Sir, the only reason why I would have anything at all in a Constitution on this subject, is, that I regard the right of the wife to have her property secured to her by law, as an abstract right; and I am willing to recognize here all abstract rights. But I am not willing on this or on any other question, to trespass upon what I regard to be the proper province of the Legislature.

Mr. NAVE said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: This subject has already consumed much of the time of the Convention, and in the opinion of many gentlemen, more time than is necessary to a full and complete understanding of it. There are some gentlemen present, I am sorry to say, who, owing perhaps to a disordered imagination, have gone so far as to assert that they have at all times, without examination or investigation, been ready to vote upon this as well as upon all other subjects, important or unimportant. In fact, from what we have heard uttered upon this floor, it appears that certain gentlemen arrive at conclusions on all questions, with much ease to themselves, without taking any time for thought or investigation. This being the case, I trust that such gentlemen upon whom the God of nature has bestowed these high endowments of intellect, will, through politeness, if not from a sense of duty which they owe to their country, if not to their less favored fellow members, accord their silence even if they decline to give their attention while those less gifted than themselves may attempt to give their views on such subjects as may occasionally come before this body for investigation.

As the calm and deliberate investigation of all questions affecting human rights has ever been deemed necessary to a thorough understanding of their effects when in practical operation, I think it would ill become us to set at naught a rule enforced both by precept and example on the part of the wise and good of every age and nation, and undertake to decide at once, in haste, and without reflection, upon questions which, when carried out in detail, may not only injure, but absolutely destroy our best interests, our dearest enjoyments, and our most sacred rights. History in every age has fully demonstrated to us the danger of hasty action in all things appertaining to human legislation. "Think, deliberate, reflect before you act," is a maxim by no means to be despised; and we find that it has been incorporated into and is constantly illustrated by the practice of some of our best institutions. Hence it is that our judges—often men of the greatest minds and the keenest perception—have sat in our courts for days listening with patience to the arguments of counsel, so that they might be the better enabled to decide aright those questions which have been submitted to them for their decision. And yet, Mr. President, in this enlightened age, and on the floor of this Convention, it has been gravely said that investigation is unnecessary; and as a proof of the assertion a rule has been adopted limiting the time in which each member shall express his sentiments—as though the capacities of each were equal to those of his fellows, and those only of the most contracted order. But, sir, the rule is passed, and it is useless to indulge in any vain regrets; and I shall therefore proceed, in the short half hour allotted to me, to investigate the proposition now before us, which is to place it in the power of married women to acquire and possess property in common with and independently of their husbands, and to sell and dispose of the same at pleasure without their consent. So it was proposed by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen).

Now, sir, in order to obtain a proper and thorough understanding of this subject, I hold that we should be acquainted with the common law, which it is proposed shall be changed; and also with the civil law, which it is proposed to substitute in lieu thereof; at least with so much of each as relates to the powers and rights of married women. I shall therefore first speak of their powers and rights under the common law.

Under that law the husband is responsible for the debts of the wife contracted before coverture; but if those debts are not recovered during coverture he is discharged from all liability to pay the same. And here the gentleman from Brown and Monroe complains of the hardness of the case brought before Chief Justice Talbot, to charge the husband, after the wife's death, with a debt of her's dum sola to the extent of what the husband received with her. The court in that case held that, "If relief ought to be given against the husband because he received sufficient property with the wife, then by the same reason, if the wife had brought no fortune to the husband, and judgment was recovered against him during coverture, relief ought to be afforded to the husband against the judgment after the death of the wife;" in which opinion I fully concur, as it appears to me to be founded in right. The husband is bound to provide his wife with necessaries suitable to her situation and his condition in life, and if she contracts debts during the coverture, the husband is bound by law to pay them.

And the husband is also liable for the torts or frauds of the wife, committed during the coverture. If committed in his company, or by his order, he alone is liable; but if not in his company, or by his order, then they are jointly liable. The wife has power under the law to sell land. This disability of the wife to contract so as to bind herself, arises not from want of discretion, but because of the marriage contract into which she has entered, by which she is placed under the power and control of the husband, and thereby has given up to him the absolute control and management of all her personal property, when reduced to the possession of the husband.

Married women in England, and in those States in this country where fines did heretofore exist, might pass their freehold estates by a fine; and that and a common recovery are the only ways in which they could convey such estates at the common law; and married women may by fine and a declaration of the uses thereof, declare the uses for the benefit of their husbands; but by the statute of William the Fourth, married women are now enabled, with the concurrence of their husbands, to dispose, by deed or relinquishment, any estate which they may have in lands, if the wife be examined separate and apart from her husband, which substitute of a deed for a conveyance, by fine, now prevails throughout these United States as the cheapest and best mode of conveyance, and is the law of this State; but under our statute law the husband cannot convey the dower right of the wife in real estate by deed.

Next, as to the wife's capacity in equity. The wife, at common law, was not allowed to possess personal property independent of her husband, as has already been shown, because of the marriage by which she and her property are placed under the control of the husband; but in equity she is allowed, through the medium of a trustee, to enjoy property as freely as a feme sole, and it is frequently the case that property is conveyed or bequeathed to a trustee in trust, to secure the interest arising therefrom to the wife, for her separate use, free from the debts, contract, or interference of the husband, and made payable on her separate order or receipt, and after the death of the wife to remain in trust for her issue, thereby securing to the wife and her issue, after her death, ample provision. Could any gentleman desire more than is contained in this wise and benevolent feature of equity? And in all cases at common law, where the husband stipulates before marriage either that his wife shall enjoy her own property, or that she shall be entitled to a certain benefit out of his estate, he will be bound in equity to perform his agreement, even though it was entered into with the wife herself, and becomes extinguished at law by his subsequent marriage. And gifts from the husband to the wife may be supported in equity as her separate property, if they are not prejudicial to the creditors of the husband, without the intervention of trustees. And as to the powers of the wife under settlements, she has the power to institute suit in equity against her husband to recover any property given her for her separate use; and if, by marriage settlement, the real and personal estate of the wife be secured to her separate use, the husband is accountable for that part of her estate which comes into his possession, and a feme covert, in reference to her separate property, is to be viewed in the light of a feme sole sub modo only, or to the extent of the power conferred upon her by the marriage settlement. Further we find that in the case of Livingston vs. Livingston, decided in the State of New York, it was held that the wife could contract with her husband even by parol after marriage for a transfer of property from him to her, or to trustees for her, provided it was for a valuable consideration, and that the same might be limited to her separate use.

Again, as to the powers of the wife over her separate property at common law. She may sell or mortgage the same for her husband's debts, and also create a valid power in the mortgagee to sell in default of payment. She can convey upon condition, and she can prescribe the terms of the conveyance.

Lord Eldon, in the case of St. John vs. St. John, in reasoning upon marriage settlements intimated that a settlement, by way of separate maintenance on a voluntary separation of husband and wife, was against the policy of the law, and therefore void, and he made no distinction between settlements resting on articles, and a final complete settlement by deed, or between the cases where a trustee indemnified the husband against the wife's debts, and where there was no such indemnity. The ground of Lord Eldon's opinion that such settlements creating a separate maintenance by voluntary agreement between husband and wife, were, in their consequences, destructive to the indissoluble nature and the sanctity of the marriage contract. And if a voluntary settlement for the separate maintenance of the wife was so considered by Lord Eldon, what may we not say of the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) which proposes by the organic law of the State to confer upon the wife both the power to acquire and hold property separate and distinct from the husband, not only for her support, but for purposes of speculation. I consider this proposition as one involving the gravest and most momentous consequences to the public interest—perhaps more so than any question that can come before this Convention. It virtually strikes at the marriage state, and proposes indirectly to make void the obligations of the marriage contract. In the codes of almost all civilized nations the law concerning husband and wife has always made a very prominent article. It occupies a large title and forms a prominent feature in the English equity jurisprudence. The trusts growing out of marriage settlements have become so extensive that an eminent lawyer of that country has said that half the property in England was vested in nominal owners. This state of things in England is easy to be accounted for. In that country titles of nobility, such as Dukes, Earls, Lords, &c., are conferred, and which can only be conferred upon large property holders; but there being no such titles in this country, nor any property qualifications required in this State, offices are conferred upon men irrespective of title or property, and for that reason the dangers and inconveniences growing out of the common law concerning husband and wife in England never can exist in this State to the extent supposed by the gentleman from Posey.

Sir, let me contrast for a moment the civil law with the common law in respect to the rights of property belonging to the matrimonial parties; and in doing so I think the common law must appear to us at least to be quite simple, and easy to be digested, compared with the complicated regulations of the community or partnership system between husband and wife which now prevails in many parts of Europe, as in France, Spain, and Holland, and also in the State of Louisiana. It is said that Prathier has examined in thirty-one volumes the whole subject of the municipal law of France, which has its foundation principally upon the civil or Roman law; and out of that number of volumes he devotes not less than six to the law of the matrimonial state. In the State of Louisiana, since the amended civil code in 1824, there are no less than sixty-five volumes of the reported decisions of the Supreme Court of that State. Now compare the number of volumes of Louisiana on this subject with the number of volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of this State, and then calmly ask yourself the causes which have produced such a difference. It cannot be that the population of Louisiana is larger than our own, for the population of our State is greater than that of Louisiana; nor can it arise out of the large commerce of the city of New Orleans; and therefore the cause mainly originates in the complication of the partnership system between man and wife now prevailing in that State.

But permit me again to return to the details of the Roman or civil law. Under this law the wife can bind herself by her contracts without charging her husband, and can sue and be sued without him. And they can sue each other; for, with respect to property, they are considered as distinct persons, and the contracts of the one are not binding upon the other. Truly, then, in the language of the gentleman from Posey, this proposition is one which, if adopted, must produce a radical change in the statute laws of Indiana hereafter to be passed—a change which will, in the future, effectually deprive the husband of the power of controlling and regulating the property of the wife, and must also destroy the indissoluble connection in which the wife is placed by marriage at the common law, being under the power and protection of her husband, and he in the possession, management, and control of her property.

In the State of Louisiana, according to their new civil code, as amended and promulgated in the year 1824, (Art. 2312, 2360, 2370,) the partnership or community of acquits or gains arising during coverture, exists by law in every marriage contract in the State, where there is no stipulation to the contrary, and is said to be founded in the presumption that the wife, by her industry and care, contributes equally with her husband to the acquisition of property; and it is held in Martin's Louisiana Reports, vol. 17, that all the property left at the death of either party is presumed to constitute the community of acquits and gains; and this presumption holds good until the contrary is made to appear, but the parties may modify or limit the partnership or agree that it shall not exist.

In art. 2305 it is said, that in case of married persons coming into Louisiana from another State, or from foreign countries, their subsequently acquired property is subject to the community of acquits; and in the case of Soul vs. his Creditors, (Martin's Reps. vol 17, p. 569,) Judge Porter held, "That though a marriage was contracted in a State governed by the common law, yet if the parties removed into Louisiana and there acquired property, such property, on the dissolution of the marriage is that State by the death of the wife, would be regulated by the law of Louisiana; consequently a community of acquits and gains did exist between the married parties from the time of their removal into the State, and the property they acquired after their removal became common, and was to be equally divided between them on the principle of partnership."

Now, taking this decision of Judge Porter as the law of the State of Louisiana, let me put a case. Suppose that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) were to take down the river any merchantable produce, and, landing any where on the shores of the Mississippi river within the limits of the State of Louisiana, were to sell such produce to a citizen of Louisiana who had a wife, for the sum of—say five thousand dollars—on a credit of six months, and that the husband and wife, at the time of such sale, were the owners of property to that amount, and that after the sale, yet prior to the time of the amount becoming due, the wife should die. What would be his position in such case? Does not the gentleman see that he would lose one-half of his demand? Most certainly. Knowing of the existence of such a law, and from conversations I have had with many legal gentlemen, I learn that many frauds have been practiced upon innocent and unsuspecting persons, who, from the nature of their business transactions, have been compelled to ship their surplus produce to that State and dispose of them upon a credit—frauds that could not have been perpetrated had it not been for the statute laws in force in Louisiana, tolerating the odious doctrine of community or partnership in property between the husband and the wife. The statements of delegates on this floor, therefore, —I will not say made at the instance of the gentleman from Posey, for I could not suspect him of seeking to accomplish any object in such a roundabout way—I say these statements which have been made by gentlemen here, and which might seem to amount to a contradiction of my remarks made heretofore on this subject, prove nothing whatever. In fact such testimony, owing to its negative character, never does prove anything, according to the law of evidence, nor is it ever held admissible in courts of justice. And notwithstanding that the gentleman from Posey has read Blackstone and other commentators on the fundamental law of the land, he has not yet finished his legal edu-tation, for if he had he would not have introduced testimony of a negative character to contradict that which is affirmative. I would suggest to the gentleman—and I make the suggestion in all courtesy and kindness—the propriety and usefulness of extending his legal researches a little further, and to read Starkie on the Law of Evidence, so that in his future efforts to enlighten the world he may not fall into a like error on a principle of law so well settled in the books.

But, Mr. President, I must apologize for this digression, and return to the subject before the Convention. I believe I was last speaking on the operation of this "separate property" system as it works in Louisiana. It is held in the cases of Cooney's heirs vs. Clark, and Broussard vs. Berword, "That the separate property of the wife is divided into dotal—being that which she brings into the household to assist in the marriage establishment—and extra dotal, or paraphernal property—being that which forms no part of the dowry. And the husband is the head and master, and the proceeds of the dowry belongs to the husband during the marriage, and he has the administration of the partnership or community of profits of the matrimonial property, and he may dispose of the revenues which they produce, and alienate them without the consent of the wife; but he cannot convey the common estate or the acquits and gains to the injury of the wife during coverture; and the wife may, at the death of her husband, by action at law set aside the alienation. And it is not the law in force at the time that the community is dissolved, but that in force when it was formed, which regulates the rights of husband and wife to the property acquired during coverture. And, also, if the husband and wife stipulate that there shall be no partnership between them, the wife preserves the entire administration of her property, movable and immovable, and may sell the same without the consent of the husband."

Having in a summary manner given a synopsis of both the common and the civil law in respect to that question, it remains for me now to draw a distinction between them in reference to the effects of each upon the happiness and prosperity of mankind.

I think it is quite evident from what I have said of the principle of the common law as a system to govern and control husband and wife in all their relations, that it considers them one in person, one in interest, one in prosperity, one in adversity. And to this unity of the marriage tie may, with propriety, be attributed the virtue and the happiness of that portion of the American people who are governed by the common law. This law seeks not the acquisition of wealth, but that happiness and peace which alone are to be found in a well regulated family circle, where the wife loves her husband, her home, her offspring, and the friends that are accustomed occasionally to attribute an additional cheerfulness to the domestic hearth, which would be stripped of all these endearments were her efforts directed to the amassing of wealth, and the management, regulation, and control of property, unbecoming her sex. It has been well said:

"Thy husband is one that cares for thee,
And for thy maintenance commits his body
To painful labors, both by sea and land,
To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,
When thou liest warm at home, secure and safe,
And craves no other tribute at thy hands
But love, fair looks, and true obedience—
Too little payment for so great a debt."

Sir, the principles and motives of the common law are all adapted to the simple form of our government, and greatly tend to make us a nation, prosperous and happy. Wherefore should we seek to change that law, and substitute in its place the Roman or civil law which is directly opposed to it in its spirit and provisions? Wherefore should we now seek to change the existing relations of husband and wife and destroy the entire force and effect of the marriage contract? Wherefore should we substitute for our present happy homes the scene of fretful strife and unhappy discord? Tell me why we should adopt this constitutional provision reported by the Chairman of the committee on "rights and privileges," (Mr. Owen,) whereby it is proposed as the organic law of the State of Indiana that—

"Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal, and laws shall be passed securing to them under equitable conditions all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

I ask again, why change the common law, and adopt the civil law with all its evils, and all its degrading and demoralizing tendencies? The gentleman from Posey answers in his speech, and says, that he desires the change in order that he may protect the wife from the profligate and intemperate husband, and to secure to widows a portion of the husband's property. The reasons assigned by him for the proposed change do not legitimately grow out of the proposition which he, as Chairman of that committee, has reported. That proposition proposes to vest in married women the right of possessing and acquiring property to their sole use, and therefore we have included in it, not only the wives of bad and ungrateful husbands, but also the wives of all others not falling within that class. He would, because of a few instances of the profligacy of bad men, change the beautiful fabric of the common law and the sanctity of the marriage state, together with its enjoyments and happiness, and create a contract, a partnership, an interest in property, separate and distinct, yielding nothing to the harmony of the domestic union but bickerings, feuds, separations and divorces of wives from husbands, and husbands from wives, thereby disturbing the very foundations on which society stands. The gentleman from Posey has, thus far, failed to meet the question before the Convention, and urged individual cases of wives and widows not now provided for by existing laws—the remedies for which cases might all be provided for by the Legislature, they having all the necessary power to do so. He has studiously avoided the main question involved in the proposition under discussion, and endeavored to induce members to come to the support of his measure by representing a few isolated cases of men not making the necessary provisions for their wives, and for the additional reason that widows, as he supposes, are not, by existing laws, well provided for. And then, sir, to cap the climax, he has said, that married women in Indiana have not as many rights as the slaves of the South! Sir, can such a state of things be possible that married women in this State are in a more degraded condition than the slaves of the South, who toil from year to year during a miserable existence, for their corn and herring, and their miserable rags of clothing? I ask again, Mr. President, is it possible that people living under the influence of Christianity, and who claim to be actuated, governed, and controlled in all their actions by honesty, justice, and humanity, are guilty of such cruelty to their wives. No, sir, such an assertion I cannot denominate otherwise than as a vile calumny upon the freemen of Indiana, and as a gross insult to the good sense of every married lady in the State.

Mr. President, what rights have married women in Indiana, secured to them by our laws? They hold and control real estate, and the husband, without the consent of the wife, can neither sell nor convey the same, nor can it be sold on execution for the payment of the husband's debts; nor can the personal property of the wife be taken for the debts of the husband, nor can it be disposed of by him until reduced to possession; and the wife may have property in the hands of a trustee—both personal and real—for her sole use and benefit. And, sir, beside all this, she is entitled to be protected, maintained, loved, and cherished by the husband. And for all acts of violence committed upon her person, except by her husband, she, together with her husband, have their remedy at law, to recover by suit, the damages sustained; she has, further, the right to prosecute by indictment in the name of the State, even her husband, for all acts of violence committed upon her person by him. Nay, more, sir; for all torts and injuries by defamation of her character or otherwise, she, together with the husband, may sue and recover damages therefor. Besides all these rights there are many others which are secured to the married women of the State of Indiana, both by the common and statute laws in force in our State, which it would occupy too much of the time of the Convention even to enumerate now. Sir, let me ask, are any of these right and privileges possessed by the married women of Indiana enjoyed by the southern slave? No, sir, none of them.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I would say to the Convention, that the happiness, prosperity, and good order of society in Indiana, depends upon their final action upon the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). Sir, if that proposition be adopted into our organic law, and if that law should ultimately be ratified by the people, I hold that it will uproot all our domestic relations, rend asunder the marriage tie, and bring us into the deplorable condition in which the inhabitants of Spain, France, Mexico, and the States of South America now are—a condition, in my judgment, growing out of the effects brought upon them by the operations of the civil law.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood by anything I have uttered in this debate as impugning the motives of any gentleman who has been found in the advocacy of the proposition offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen); but before I close my remarks on this very important subject I must be permitted to notice and expose an error into which the gentleman from Posey has fallen, which I shall endeavor to do in all kindness. He says that the amendment offered by myself to the proposition under discussion, proposes to place the property of the wife beyond the reach of the creditors of the husband, and that, therefore, it contains the very features of the law in force now in Louisiana, of which I have complained so bitterly. In this, the gentleman from Posey is greatly mistaken. My proposition is nothing but an exemption. It does not propose to prevent the husband from selling and disposing of the property of the wife, nor from controlling, managing, and regulating the same, nor does it offer to disannul the marriage contract, by placing husband and wife in business, as dealers in trade, either as partners or in opposition to each other, as does the law in Louisiana—the civil law, the bantling of those in the Convention, who advocate the proposition reported by the chairman of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

The gentleman from Posey tells a thrilling story of a heartless husband immigrating to the town in which he resides, in company with his wife; of the wife having several boxes of goods, and of the husband fraudulently obtaining possession of the goods, disposing of them, and leaving the wife without the means of support. This circumstance could not have been mentioned by the gentleman for any other purpose than that of influencing votes in this Convention, as it must be apparent to every reflecting mind, that it has nothing to do with the question now before us. Suppose that the civil law had been in force at the time of the transaction referred to by the gentleman, and the wife had resorted to her action of replevin, and recovered the goods from the innocent purchaser; suppose further that the husband had run off to parts unknown with the value of the goods in his pocket, the wife in possession of the goods and the purchaser swindled out of his money. Would there be any justice in such a transaction? None. And, besides, under the operations of the civil law, husband and wife could enter into a combination, and the husband sell the property of the wife to an innocent purchaser, receive the money, leave the State, and the wife sue the purchaser, recover the property, and follow the husband; and they might follow up such a system of fraud ad infinitum; and the law, advocated by the gentleman from Posey, would be well calculated to encourage such frauds upon the community.

One word now in answer to the arguments of another gentleman, when he gives us an instance of a drunken and worthless husband breaking open the trunk of his wife and taking out a small pittance of money earned by her. True, the conduct of that husband was reckless and unbecoming; but let me ask that gentleman, whether he might not have done the same act if the civil law had been in operation? [Applause]. Most certainly; and, being bankrupt, the wife by suit could not in any way have been profited. Such instances as these referred to by gentlemen, with so much pathos and feeling in advocacy of the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, prove nothing more than this, that there are some men who have wives, who are not worthy of them. ["Hear, hear."] But most certainly such arguments do not prove any pressing necessity for the adoption of the civil law in this State, thereby creating new rights, and with them giving new impulses to litigation, by no means creditable to a free, happy, and prosperous people.

Mr. President, I must say, that when the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vanderburg, (Mr. Blythe,) was first offered here, I was inclined to give it my support; but after carefully examining it, I must say, that I regard it as being neither more nor less than the original proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) clothed in different language. It appears to contain the same objectionable features as that contained in the section reported by the committee on rights and privileges, namely, that the wife shall have both the right of holding and acquiring property independently of, and separately and distinctly from, the husband, and of controlling, managing, and disposing of the same at pleasure, thereby virtually disannulling and making void the obligations of the marriage contract, the effect of which must inevitably tend to build up a system of mere socialism in the State of Indiana, out of which infidelity—as all past experience has shown—will be the necessary result, entailing upon us as a people the same evils which have been entailed upon France under the operation of the Roman or civil law—the law now in force in that country regulating the rights of married women, and the same in principle as that now before this body. I will add no more than merely to ask of the gentleman from Posey, as well as those who with myself have opposed it, to pause and consider well the effect of the measure upon the prosperity and happiness of a free and happy people, before they cast their votes.

Mr. BADGER. As I have been accused, Mr. President, of preaching the gospel on this floor, I will endeavor further to merit the accusation by preaching a little more. Bold as the assertion may appear in the eyes of this Convention, I maintain that this section and all its amendments are wrong—that the whole matter is radically wrong; and that it is a matter with which this Convention has nothing to do—a matter over which it should have no control whatever.

Sir, I am the last man in the world that would undertake to advocate the doctrine that women should have no rights; but at the same time the question arises "have they no rights already?" Does the law give them no right? When we look upon the principles recognized by the law, as well as by the Bible, upon which the law is or ought to be predicated, I ask if ladies have no right—I ask if they have not all the rights which the Bible designed them to have in this Christian land of ours? And if they have all the rights which the Bible designed they should have, where is the necessity of occupying the time of the Convention in discussing matters which are entirely foreign to the object of our meeting in this Hall? Sir, I propose for a very few moments to deal in facts—and facts it has been well said are "stubborn things." I stated a few days ago that I regarded this proposed change as contrary to the genius and spirit of the Holy Scriptures. And now I shall endeavor, in as few words as possible, to prove that position. And now "to the law and to the testimony." In the third chapter of Genesis at the sixteenth verse, we find that God said unto Eve, when pronouncing the curse upon her, for her transgression, "Thy desire shall be unto thy husband and he shall rule over thee."

But this proposition before the Convention, would, as I conceive, tend to reverse that declaration of the Most High, and make the woman the ruler over the man.

Well, then, let us come to examine into the law of descent of property. Under the ancient economy we find the following to be the law, and gentlemen would perhaps do well to note down my texts, as I may not have time to do more than furnish a mere reference. In the twenty-seventh chapter of the book of Numbers, we find the law of inheritance laid down. From that chapter it appears that the daughters of Zelaphehad came to Moses, and to Elieazar the priest, and complained saying: that their father had died in the wilderness, leaving no sons, and they desired that the inheritance of their father should be given to them. And Moses brought the case before the Lord, and the Lord decided that their petition was right, and he laid down the law of inheritance thus:

"If a man die and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter.

"And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren.

"And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren."

Turn again to the thirtieth chapter of the same book, and you will find that the husband had a right to nullify any vow made by his wife or his daughter. The following is the language which we there find:

"If a woman also take a vow unto the Lord and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth;

"And her father hear her bond and her vow, wherewith she hath bound her soul; and her father shall hold his peace at her, then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand."

"But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth, not any of her vows or her bonds, wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand; and the Lord shall forgive her because her father disallowed her.

"And if she had at all a husband when she vowed, or uttered aught out of her lips wherewith she bound her soul,

"And her husband heard it and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it, then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand.

"But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it, then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect and the Lord shall forgive her."

Turn again to the 36th chapter of the same book, and there you will find the law given in detail by which the daughters were to have their portion of the land given to them which belonged to them. We find further, that they were directed to marry the sons of those who belonged to the same tribe as their fathers, and simply for this reason, that the realty passed from the hands of the daughter to the hands of her husband.

Now, sir, I have heard it said that we had some members on this floor that had not more faith in this volume than the law allowed them, and consequently it may be denied that these texts have any bearing upon the subject under consideration, on the ground that they relate to a state of things existing under the Jewish economy, while we are living under the Christian dispensation. This objection, however, is of no force, for we shall find that in this respect the one dispensation sustains the other, and that under the Christian economy, the relations of husband and wife are substantially the same. Let us see now what we can find in the New Testament upon this subject.

In the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians in the 11th Chapter, 3d verse we have the following:

"But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God."

Now, in the same proportion, in the same ratio, in the same sense as that in which Christ is the head of every man, just in that sense is the man the head of the woman. Now, in what sense is Christ the head over every man? The Bible tells us plainly that he is "head over all things." Very well; then so is the man the head over the woman in "all things." "Oh, no!" says the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen); "not so. I cannot admit that. I do not believe that. On the contrary, I think it is quite right and proper that laws should be passed securing to married women all the property which they may own before their marriage, and all that they can acquire after their marriage, whether by purchase, or gift, or devise, or descent, or in any other way. Let them have it all; it all belongs to them. The husband ought to have nothing to do with it."

Mr. President, I cannot but regard this proposition as tending in the highest degree, to create discord and disunion between the heads of families. It is, in my estimation, a positive violation of a divine precept which no man can sustain without doing injustice to the divine record, and trampling sacrilegiously under foot this divinely authorized institution, Marriage, with its relative obligations.

But I will read another text. It is in the 14th chapter of the same book and in the 34th verse.

"Let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak."

"Ah," says the gentleman from Posey, "this has nothing whatever to do with the subject about which we are speaking. We are discussing the rights of women to hold property, and not whether they shall speak in the Church!" But I answer his remark by saying that if under the Christian institution there is any liberty bestowed at all, it is bestowed in all its fullness in the church. And if women are not allowed to speak there, will gentlemen say that their voice shall be raised in uproarious clamor around the sanctuary of the hearth where the husband is the sole proprietor? I leave those gentlemen who favor the proposition of the gentlemen from Posey to answer. [Applause].

Now turn to the epistle to the Ephesians, chapter 5, verses 22, 23, 24 and 25. [Loud cries of "read, read, read"].

The verses were read as follows:

"Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord.

"For the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the Church, and he is the Saviour of the body.

"Therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything.

"Husbands love your wives even as Christ also loved the Church and gave himself for it.

[Immense applause, followed the reading of these verses which was continued for a considerable time.]

Mr. B. proceeded: Now what does Paul say here? "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands." "Why," says the gentleman from Posey, "not very far. Give them equal rights and privileges—everything they had before marriage and all that they can acquire after."

"Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands." How far? Paul says the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the Church, and that wives are to subject themselves unto their husbands. In what mode are they to do this? The gentleman from Posey says, "Not so far as your property is concerned." But what says the text? It says that they are to be subject to their own husbands in everything. Well, sir, this matter of property is a PART OF EVERYTHING [long continued applause].

But now, while I am disposed to contend for the rights of the husband—those rights which are guarantied by the laws of Heaven, and the laws of nature and of nature's God—I have no disposition to rob the better part of human nature of any of their privileges; and in this connection I will recite what the divine injunction is to the husbands. Here it is: "Husbands love your wives." How much? "Even as Christ has loved the Church." And how much did he love the Church? Just so much as to give himself for the Church; and just so much must the husband love the wife. [Great applause.] If a man loves his wife just as much as this Book commands him to do—I say it fearlessly, and without any dread of successful contradiction—that he will discharge all his duties so punctually—so promptly—that the wife will never have any cause to complain that she has not a right to acquire property, and to appropriate it to her own use, and have it at her sole disposal.

But, sir, I have one or two more texts yet, to which I wish to direct the attention of the Convention. The next is in the 3d chapter of Colossians and the 18th verse:

"Women submit yourselves unto your husbands as is fit in the Lord."

Now it is said, that, "in the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established." Well, sir, I have yet another witness. [Great applause.] Turn to 1 Tim., chap. 2d, v. 11 and 12:

"Let the women learn in silence with all subjection.

"For I suffer not a woman to teach nor to USURP AUTHORITY OVER THE MAN, [loud applause,] but to be in silence.

"For Adam was first formed, then Eve;

"And Adam was not deceived; but the woman being deceived was in the transgression,"

Now, sir, I think I have introduced "witnesses" enough on that part of the subject, and with the permission of the Convention, I will turn to another feature of the case, which has an equally strong bearing upon the question under discussion. [Cries of "hear him! hear him!" and "consent! consent!"]

Turn now to the 5th chapter of the first epistle of Paul to Timothy and the 14th verse. What have we here? Why, sir, we have a special injunction upon the women. What is it? Here it is: "I will, therefore, that the younger women marry." What else? Why, that they "bear children." ["Consent! consent!"] What else? Why, that they "guide the house," [renewed applause,] "and give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully." [Cries of "hear him! hear him! hear him!" accompanied by clapping of hands and thumping on the benches.] What does the gentleman from Posey say? Does he say, "Guide the house?" No, sir; no. His injunction to women is: "Guide the farm, mind the cattle, take care of the team, drive the hogs to the market, drive the sheep to the slaughter pen, keep the purse, dispose of the property—in short, rule your husband, and let him take care of the children, wash the dishes, and darn the stockings." [The burst of applause which followed this is indescribable.] But Paul says the woman is to "guide the house." The gentleman from Posey and Paul for it, then; and we will see who comes out best. [Laughter and cheering.]

But, Mr. President, I perceive that I have only four minutes left. I understand that we are limited to fifteen minutes, and I see that eleven of them are gone, and I have two texts more to which I wish to refer. [Loud cries of "go on! go on! go on!"]

Mr. COLFAX. I move to suspend the rule.

Mr. BADGER. If gentlemen would not applaud so much, or rather, I should say, if they would not make so much noise, I could finish in four minutes; for I do not wish to be a violator of rules.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention suspend the rule?

[Loud cries of "Go on! go on! go on!" and "No need to suspend the rule yet; time's not up!"]

Mr. BADGER. Well, I will read two more verses. [Cries "Hear him! hear him!" and "Read! read!"]

Titus, 2d chapter, 3d and 4th verses:

"The aged women likewise, that they be in behavior as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to wine, teachers of good things.

"That they may teach the young women to be sober, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed."

Now that is the language of the law of the Lord on this subject; and I now make an appeal to every gentleman on this floor to be cautious in casting his vote for the purpose of granting separate privileges to wives in relation to property—privileges which, if I view the matter aright, and in accordance with the divine law, will tend to disorganize society, disrupt domestic quiet, profane the sanctity of the domestic altar, and stifle the best and purest feelings of the human heart. [Applause.]

Mr. President, I have another text which I must read—another of those witnesses which speak with so much truth and authority. [Cries of "Read! read! read!"]

"For after this manner, in the old time, the holy women, also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands."

How far were they in subjection?

"Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord,"

Which means a "ruler." If, then, a man is a "Lord or ruler" over his wife;—if, in his household, he is "head over all things," in the same ratio as Christ is "head over all things to his Church," and that we have on the authority of Holy Writ, I ask, in the name of reason—in the name of truth—in the name of common sense—in the name of morality—in the name of religion—in the name of all that is dear on earth and holy in Heaven—how is it, and why is it, that gentlemen rise up in the middle of the nineteenth century, before an enlightened and Christian community, and plead for a doctrine which will subvert the best interests of the community—stifle all the finer feelings of the human heart that enter into the family dwelling, and surround the domestic hearth—blast the brightest, fairest, happiest hopes of the human family, and go in direct contravention of that law which bears the everlasting impress of the Almighty's hand. Sir, I am not here to attribute improper motives to any gentleman on this floor; but I must say this much, that I cannot but regard such a scheme not only as wild and visionary beyond expression, but even as wicked, if not in its intentions, at least in its results. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT. I must now remind the gentleman from Putnam that his time has expired.

A MEMBER, whose name the Reporter could not learn, moved to suspend the fifteen minutes rule.

The motion was carried by unanimous consent, and amid loud cries of "Go on! go on! go on!"

Mr. BADGER. I will not occupy more than five minutes more of the time of the Convention; and I hope the Convention will accord to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) the same liberality, when he undertakes to reply. ["Hear! hear!"]

I have a quotation here from a speech delivered the other day by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) and also a quotation from a hand-bill which he read a few days since, and which I understand has circulated in that county pretty widely. In that circular he said it was important that no rash experiments should be ingrafted upon the Constitution, and yet I understand him to be an advocate for this radical change which I have, I think, shown to be contrary to the divine law. I will read a brief extract from the speech.

"Mr. Read of Monroe said, that the laws in force in relation to women were a disgrace to the Christian and enlightened age in which we lived. Not that the practices under these laws were so, but they so appeared as laid down in our statutes and the common law. This age, in its enlightened progress, had rose superior to the laws under which we lived in the action under them. Gentlemen had entirely mistaken the causes of our happy homes. It was Christianity, pure and untrammelled Christianity, more than anything else, to which we were indebted for the happy homes of Indiana."

Now, if one step, one remove from the doctrines of the Christian religion will produce all these lamentable consequences which are thus so pathetically deplored, what consequences may we not expect, and how does the gentleman, after these sentences in his speech, and that in his circular, dare to take another step—another remove from Christianity? I leave that for him to settle with his own conscience.

But the gentleman from Orange (Mr. Sherrod) paid me a compliment the other day, on which I must ask permission to say one word. I had said that I was willing to meet any delegate on this question at any time, and that I believed that the proposition contained in this section was altogether contrary to, and at variance with, the genius and spirit of the Christian religion. I had no sooner made that declaration than he rose from his seat, and with all the pomp and dignity which, I am sorry to say, sometimes distinguishes the profession to which he belongs, he remarked, "We have spent several days in learning the l-a-w on this question, and now I suppose the gentleman from Putnam has given us the g-o-s-p-e-l." [Roars of laughter.]

Now let me say here—and I am sorry to feel that it is necessary that it should be said—if we had more ballast and less sails, more fact and less fiction, than we have been favored with on some occasions, gentlemen would not only do more good in aiding this Convention to form a good Constitution, but they might, by possibility, immortalize their names.

Sir, if bombast were eloquence, if fustian were learning, if erratic sallies into regions of untraveled nonsense were indicative of original genius or of deep research, the gentleman from Orange would be great. But as these things are not so, I look at the day as being extremely remote when the topmost pinnacle of his fame will tarnish the heavens, or touch even the unsullied clouds. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. President, I intended to advert to the remarks of some two or three other gentlemen, but my time has expired; and I will close these remarks by reading what are my sentiments, embodied in a beautiful poetic extract taken from a Southern paper, and recommended to be read in the next ladies' convention that may be held in the North.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

BY MRS. N. P. LASSELLE.

It is her right to watch beside
The bed of sickness and of pain,
And when the heart almost despairs,
To whisper hopes of health again.

Her right, to make the hearth-stone glad,
With gentle words and cheerful smile;
And when man is with care oppress'd,
His wearied spirit to beguile.

It is her right to train her sons
So they may Senate chambers grace—
Thus, is she with more honor crown'd,
Than if herself had filled the place.

It is her right to be admir'd
By ev'ry generous, manly heart,
When, with true dignity and grace,
She acteth well a woman's part.

She hath a dearer right than this;
To be in one true heart enshrined—
Who, though the world may all forsake,
Will cherish still, and still be kind.

And there is yet a higher right,
Which, also, is to woman given:
'T is hers, to teach the infant mind
Those truths divine, which came from heaven:

What would she more, than to perform,
On earth, life's holiest, sweetest tasks?
When you a perfect woman find,
No other rights than these she asks.

[Mr. B. sat down amid loud applause and cries of "question, question."]

Mr. SHERROD. I have not risen, Mr.

President, to make a speech in reply to the gentleman from Putnam; for, sir, if there is one thing more painful for me to do than another, it is to kick against the wind; but inasmuch as the gentleman has alluded to me in a very discourteous manner, I think it necessary to make a single remark, by way of returning my compliments to that very sensitive gentleman. I was not aware, Mr. President, that I was so eloquent as the gentleman has represented me to be. I alluded to the gentleman in the outset of my remarks some days since, as I thought, in a gentlemanly manner; I did not intend the remark I made as a "cut" by any means. I think, as well as I recollect, I remarked that I had been an attentive listener to the discussion of the legal bearings of this question, and I thought the gentleman from Putnam had now given us its gospel bearings. He had said that he was prepared to convince the Convention that the proposition was contrary to the spirit and the genius of the Christian religion. And knowing that the gentleman professes to be a minister of the gospel, and knowing, too, that these gentlemen are generally very pompous men, and proud of their profession, I supposed that he would take the remark I made as a compliment, of course. Now, Mr. President, we have had his eloquent, or rather windy speech here, and I must say that I expected, from the bold declaration that he made some days since, that he really was going to convince the Convention that we were in error in entertaining this proposition. What has he done? He has convinced us of one thing at least, and that is, that he is sailing under false colors; that he professes to know all about that of which he knows nothing at all. He reminds me, sir, of a gentleman who had become hypochondriacal, and who took it into his head that he could fly. He went to work and made himself a pair of sheep-skin wings; he went into a field and climbed up a rugged tree, and off he went, sure enough. Well, what was the result? He came down, of course, and broke a leg and knocked in some four or five ribs. Sometime afterwards, when some of his neighbors met him, who had heard of his misfortune, asked him how it was to fly, he replied, "Flying goes well enough, but it is a little the roughest lighting prehaps." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I do not pretend to say what misfortune the gentleman may have encountered in the ethereal flight he has just taken in search of woman's rights; but there is one thing that must be evident to all, and that is, that he is laboring under the same mental alienation that the gentleman was who imagined he could fly.

The gentleman's speech was loud and bombastic enough; but who, I ask, is there in this Convention that he has convinced? Instead of convincing the Convention that they are in error in entertaining this proposition, he has done nothing more than excite their derision and laughter.

[Loud cries of "Question! question! question!" and "Owen! Owen!"]

Mr. OWEN said, that, as it only wanted ten minutes of dinner time, and as he would rather proceed with his remarks when he would, not be likely to be interrupted by a motion to adjourn, he would move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Pending the question on the amendment of Mr. BLYTHE,

The Convention then adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section in relation to the rights of married women.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Will the gentleman from Posey do me the favor to yield the floor for not more than five minutes?

Mr. OWEN. Most certainly, I will, with great pleasure, yield the floor to the gentleman from Monroe.

Mr. READ. The gentleman from Putnam, in his sermon of this morning, (not a very orthodox one, according to my notions of orthodoxy,) did me the honor to notice a sentiment which I had uttered on a previous occasion, that in Constitution making or mending, there should be no rash experimenting. That is a sentiment, I will say to the gentleman, to which I still adhere. New and strange principles I reject, as forming a part of the organic law. But well tried principles of right which the whole country has reached in the progress of experience and of more enlarged sentiments of justice and humanity, it may be very proper to incorporate into a political constitution, declaring the rights of the people. Just such, most emphatically I hold, is the declaration in regard to the property rights of females, contained in the section before us, which by so large a majority we have voted to engrossment. That more just and humane—yes, sir, more Christian sentiments even, are beginning to prevail on this subject, is to be seen in the Statutes of the different States—in the writings of jurists—in State Constitutions, and in judicial decisions.

In proof of the liberal tendency of our American legislation on this subject I had occasion to refer, a day or two since, to a paragraph in Mansfield's work on the legal rights of women.

I have in my hand an extract from Walker's Introduction to American Law, which will show how he regards the law in the condition in which it now exists in Indiana. After a comparison of the property rights of husband and wife, he says: "from first to last, the man has the advantage." Again he says: "our law is vastly more liberal toward woman than the English;" (a sad decline in our country from the Christian rule on this subject, as interpreted by some gentlemen;) yet even here, she has too much reason to regret, that her lot has not fallen under the civil law. I can see, he continues, neither policy, justice, nor humanity, (he might well have added, according to my conceptions of that sublime system, nor Christianity,) in many of the legal doctrines with respect to married women. But there is one evil which pre-eminently calls for correction. I refer to the entire helplessness of a married woman, when her husband becomes a prodigal or spend-thrift. If he take care to give no cause of divorce, she has no means of providing against the utter ruin which she sees approaching. He may squander a personal estate worth a million of dollars, and leave a wife and children; and the wife cannot in this State, (he is speaking of the State of Ohio, where the law has since been corrected,) invoke the aid of a court to prevent it. (How Christian the law.) Some of the other States have provided for such a case; others have secured to her use her own separate property, whether personal or real; and there is evidently a strong tendency in public opinion toward securing to her some of the more important legal rights."

Mr. President, in this debate we have heard much of the requisitions of Christianity. Christianity, indeed! What abuse, what tyranny, what usurpation of right, what monstrous principle, has ever existed under the whole canopy of the Heaven, for the support of which the name of Christianity has not been invoked. [Applause.] Even in our own country, how was it in the war of the Revolution? However patriotic were a portion and the larger portion of the clergy, there were those, who, from the text "honor the king," endeavored to call in religion to the support of tyranny. All over Europe, the sacred name of Christianity is, at this time, invoked to stay the progress of human freedom, and to arrest the liberalizing tendencies of the age. In times past, no bloody code has been enacted, nor bloody deed done, nor human rights trodden down, but all has been done in the name of Christianity. Sir, for myself I do not so read and so learn the precepts and doctrines of Jesus.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) has referred to the heroic ages. Well, sir, what were the heroic ages, and what was the state of society then? They were ages when physical force triumphed, when war was the chief business of men, when the weak had no rights, when women were the merest beasts of burden. Would the gentleman carry us back to those ages?

Mr. CLARK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for explanation?

Mr. READ. Most certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. The gentleman is laboring under a great mistake when he supposes I referred to what are commonly called the "heroic ages." I referred to the "heroic age" of our own country—the times of our courageous ancestors, and not to the "heroic ages" of other countries.

Mr. READ. I misunderstood the gentleman's remarks, and am most happy to be corrected.

If, sir, there is any heroism, in the might of our manly power, in refusing to women their just rights of property—the right to hold their own—then give me the Christian ages, and the Christian influences under which woman had already gained so much, and is destined in the evident tendency of things to attain those rights of which the heroism and feudalism of other ages reaching in their influence down to our own times, has so long deprived her.

I here avow, in the presence of this Convention, and of the world, that my hope of all reform, legal, constitutional, social, and domestic, is founded in Christianity. Here, sir, I rest my hopes of human progress; and to no other system do I look for that purity and elevation, which I believe society, under the fullness of Christian influence, is destined to attain.

But, Mr. President, I rose merely for the purpose of saying to the gentleman from Putnam that I adhere, in every particular, to the principle which I have heretofore laid down as a cardinal one, in re-forming a Constitution, that we ought not to adopt doubtful or experimental views. And I hold in regard to the section which we ordered last evening to be engrossed, that it contains no such principle, but embodies the feelings and sentiments of the whole country, and expresses that sense of right and justice which exists in the public mind.

Mr. OWEN. As Chairman of the Committee on Rights and Privileges, whence most of the sections heretofore acted upon by the Convention have been reported, and also, occasionally, as the object of personal attack, I have been compelled to speak, of late, more frequently than I desired or intended. I hope, however, that, under present circumstances, the same courtesy will be extended to me as was extended, this morning, to the gentleman from Putnam; and I assure the Convention that its indulgence shall not be abused.

Sir, if I were a timid man. I might have been alarmed at the two batteries—one on my left (Mr. Nave) and one immediately on my right (Mr. Badger) which exploded here this morning. I noticed, that, in the discharge of these two batteries, there were some things that differed and others that were in common. It cannot have escaped your observation that both pieces had been loaded for some time, and with much care. In this they resembled each other. But while the one on my right was discharged at the object for which it was specially loaded, my friend on my left (Mr. Nave) evidently prepared to slay one man, and finally took aim at another. When the ball was rammed home, it was unquestionably intended for me. But it was discharged at my luckless friend from Vanderburgh. I hope he survived the shot. [Laughter.]

Sir, I have, now and then, carried a rifle; and I have remarked that it is usually a dangerous thing to change one's aim at the moment of firing. One is very apt to miss the mark. So, beyond question, has it been in the present case. The gentleman had prepared certain objections to the original sections; and there was some plausibility in these, thus directed. But calling to mind that the sections in question are no longer before us, he turns the battery prepared for them against the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburgh, without reflecting whether the loading would suit; and, as a very natural consequence, he totally misses his mark. Under that amendment, he says: "The courts will decide that married women have a right to go into market as independent traders." Have the courts decided, that, under the present law—the law of the session of 1846–7—they are independent traders! The gentleman knows that they have not. Yet that law, as to real estate, is more strongly worded than the section offered by the gentleman from Vanderburgh. The words are, "or which she may fairly acquire during her coverture." This is as full as the expression, "acquire by purchase, gift, devise, or descent." And there are added, in that law, the words "to be her separate property." It is not, as in our section, that the property shall be secured to her; it is that she shall enjoy it to her separate use. Certainly, whatever objection can be raised, on that score, to the section before us, can be raised also, and with much greater force, against the law under which we have been living for the last four years; and living contentedly, too, without for a moment imagining, what gentlemen have so suddenly and recently discovered, that, in principle, it offends not only against domestic harmony, but also against morality and religion.

I turn now to my friend on the right, from Putnam (Mr. Badger). Unlike the gentleman on my left, he did not change his aim. He carried out his original intentions, and discharged his piece at the object, for which, at the first, it was loaded.

Yet I have a charge to bring against him here. I arraign him as having violated—not indeed a text of Scripture—but an old Latin adage, generally assented to by the world, and venerable for its antiquity. He has doubtless heard of it: "De mortuis nihil nisi bonum." Or, rendered in the vernacular, "Thou shalt not speak ill of the dead!"

Is he not guilty? Here was this unfortunate section, reported from the Committee on Rights and Privileges, slain yesterday, by a vote of 65 to 64; the gentleman himself aiding and abetting the act. It is numbered with the dead. It was sent to the repository of things lost. It descended to the tomb of the Capu-lets. Yet nothing will satisfy the gentleman but to exhume the dead, that he may have a chance, here in public and before us all, to mangle a lifeless body. [Laughter and applause.] The battery so carefully loaded, so long withheld, was discharged at last, against an inanimate, unoffending corpse. The brains were out, the body was stiff and cold. I appeal to the gentleman's sense of humanity, to his manhood, and I ask him whether he thinks it was brave or generous to pursue his victim even beyond the grave, and pummel it right and left, as if it still retained the vigor and energy of life and youth?

Nay, sir, I doubt much whether the gentleman's conduct was constitutional. [Laughter.] "Cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted." [Renewed laughter.] And unusual it surely is, for any one to visit the churchyard, and vent, upon its slumbering inmates, his quenchless wrath. Vultures and hyenas, only, profane the tomb. Men attack the living, not the dead. Or if, in history, there be a parallel to the vengeance of the gentleman from Putnam, it is to be found in the story of Achilles, who, not satisfied with slaying Hector, dragged thrice around the walls of Troy, the senseless corpse.

But the gentleman from Putnam belongs to a profession, the members of which I have been trained, even from my youth up, personally to respect, and he shall have a serious answer to his theological argument.

His undertaking is, to prove, that this section—the dead one—is "contrary to the spirit of the Christian Scriptures." And how does he set about proving this? First, he quoted from the Old Testament, and tells us of the daughters of Zelophihad, who applied for their father's inheritance. He did not read the passage; suffer me to do so for him:

"Moses brought their cause before the Lord.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

"The daughters of Zelophihad speak right; thou shalt surely give them an inheritance among their father's brethren."

And then follows a general law of inheritance, as follows:

"Thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying,

"If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass to his daughter.

"And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance to his brethren," &c.

Does the gentleman cite us to this, as to something we are to imitate! Our own law of inheritance, as the gentleman from Decatur and other gentlemen have well said, is iniquitous enough; but that of Moses is ten times worse. "If he have no son," the daughters shall inherit; not otherwise. Nothing for them if a son survive. Are we to imitate this law, and give to the sons all and to the daughters nothing? Is that the gentleman's proposal? If not, why cite us to a text like this?

Again: if there be neither sons or daughters, the inheritance goes to the husband's brothers or sisters. No provision for the widow. No mention of her, any more than if she did not exist. Are we to copy this also?

Why cite to us Moses's laws? They are interesting to us as history; but are we bound by them? I think few of the gentlemen's colleagues in the ministry will take that ground. Whither would such a doctrine lead? If not to primogeniture, to something very like it. I read from Deuteronomy, chap. 21, verse 15:

"If a man have two wives, one beloved and another hated, and if they have both borne him children; and if the first-born be hers that was hated:

"Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved, first-born before the son of the hated, which is indeed the first-born:

"But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the first-born, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath."

He shall acknowledge the first-born. How! By "giving him a double portion of all that he hath." Are we to cast away our noble law that gives to each child an equal portion and adopt the Jewish rule; to give to the first-born twice as much as to any of his brothers or sisters. Yet if we are to follow Moses as a legislator in the spirit of one law, why not in another?

Here is another law from the Pentateuch, Numbers, chap. 15, verse 32:

"The children of Israel found a man that gathered sticks upon the Sabbath day.

"And they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, the man shall surely be put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp.

"And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died."

Is that a law we are prepared to adopt in this western country? If a man, on the Sabbath, step out from his cabin into the adjoining forest to gather sticks to boil the pot that is to contain his dinner, are his neighbors to gather together and stone him to death? Truly might it be said, in such a case, as on a more memorable occasion: "He that is without blame among you, let him cast the first stone." It has been a question of interest whether, even for the revolting crime of deliberate murder, the death-penalty should not be abolished. What shall we say of a law that imposes such a penalty.

for an offense, if offense it be, so trifling as this?

One other example may suffice in proof, that the laws of the Jews, however they may have been adapted to the age and the nation in which they prevailed, suit not our nation and our age, and ought therefore to be no rule to us. I read from Deuteronomy, chap. 22, verse 10:

"Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together.

"Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woolen and linen together.

"Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the four quarters of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself."

Are we to obey such laws as these? Is the gentleman from Putnam prepared to put on the leather hunting shirt of the western pioneer, bedecked with fringes, and enter the Convention in such a costume?

Mr. BADGER (in his seat). I have worn a hunting shirt, before now.

Mr. OWEN. Very possibly; but if the gentleman has now ceased to wear one, is he thereby violating the law of God?

Mr. BADGER. Leather jackets are not the subject under discussion.

Mr. OWEN. But the principle involved in the command to wear them is.

Enough of this, however. If these texts seem to the gentleman irrelevant, he shall have one bearing on his own course on this floor.

There is but a single delegate in this Convention, the gentleman from Steuben, (Mr. May,) who cast his vote in favor of negro suffrage. Every other delegate voted to make distinction between white and colored men; the gentleman from Putnam among the number.

Mr. BADGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I was not here when that vote was taken.

Mr. OWEN. Ah! then I shall have to guess how the gentleman would have voted; or, rather, if the gentleman will but say, that, if here, he would have voted to give the negro the same right of suffrage as ourselves, he shall have the benefit of that declaration. [A pause, and laughter.]

The gentleman is silent. Well, here is the text:

"Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for one of your own country."

Is there to be one manner of law for the African race and ours? Or when we make one manner of law for ourselves and another for the negro, asserting our right to suffrage and denying it to him, do we not act in violation of that text? [Applause.] Is not the vote the gentleman will yet give against negro suffrage, in violation, if his own argument be good for anything, of "the spirit of the Christian Scriptures?" [Applause.]

It is quite clear, then, that the Old Testament, when it records Jewish law, cannot be our guide; and that Moses' law of descents, which prefers sons to daughters, has no bearing whatever on the question before us, and does not, in the slightest degree, prove the gentleman's position, that husbands should have all the property and wives none.

But there were also quoted by the gentleman texts from the New Testament—texts enjoining, in the wife, obedience to the husband. And these also are adduced in support of the common law doctrine which deprives the wife of all rights to property.

Here are texts in language quite as forcible, enjoining obedience by servants to their masters:

"Servants be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart, as unto Christ." Ephesians, chap. 6, verse 5.

You cannot well find words more forcible than these—"as unto Christ." They are as strong as those of any text enjoining obedience in the wife. If, then, the command in the wife to obey justifies and requires that she should own and control no property, then by parity of reasoning, must obedience in the servant lead to the same conclusion. Is the gentleman from Putnam prepared to say, that, because the hired servant girl who may aid his wife in her domestic duties, is enjoined, in this text, to be obedient to her master as unto Christ, she is not, therefore, to become the owner and disposer of property, real or personal? [Applause.]

But there are more such texts:

"Servants, obey in all things, your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God." Colossians, chap. 3, verse 22.

And again:

"Exhort servants to be obedient to their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again." Titus, chap. 2, verse 9.

Strong text, that, sir! They are not even to answer again, if reproved.

And here is yet another:

"Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward."

You can find no stronger texts than those requiring in the wife submission to her husband. And if, because of the texts quoted by the gentleman, it is to be held contrary to the divine rule, that married women shall become independent owners of property, just as certainly must we conclude that the spirit of the Christian Scriptures is violated, if servants own property in any case whatever.

Nor are the texts which enjoin submission, confined to servants alone. There is that celebrated one in Romans, so often quoted by legitimists, against republican revolutionists:

"Let every soul be subject to the higher powers;" and that other, commanding us to submit ourselves "to the King, as Supreme." Is the inference from such texts to be, that subjects are not to become independent owners of property? There was, indeed, a time when some such doctrine prevailed; when the legal theory was, that the king was the owner of all the land within the kingdom, and his vassals held under him but as retainers of the Crown, in virtue, and on condition of military service. Does the gentleman from Putnam propose to revive that exploded, feudal doctrine?

Again, sir: are not children commanded to obey their parents? What is the first commandment with promise?

"Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

And is this restricted to the age of majority? There is no such restriction. An unmarried woman of twenty-one years, residing in her father's house, is commanded to obey her parents. But is she, therefore, to be divested of that property, which the common law itself has not ventured to deny to her?

I turn from these texts, and quote against the gentleman's argument another, not of Paul, but of Jesus; a text from that beautiful Sermon on the Mount, which heathen and Christian alike admire, as a sublime lesson in morality:

"Blessed are the meek"—and what is added?—"for they shall inherit the earth."

What is the legitimate deduction from the spirit of that text? Is it not that hereafter property shall not be the heritage of power, the reward of force alone? May we not fairly infer that it condemns the engrossing of the world's goods by men, and favors the owning of property by that sex also, of which meekness is the peculiar grace?

If the gentleman should argue, in reply, that the province of Scripture is to teach morality, not to dictate to us the details of law, I fully concur in the opinion. But, in that case, what becomes of his argument, that the civil law rule in regard to married women's rights to property is a violation of the spirit of the Scriptures?

I can find Scripture, which, if it is to be literally construed, condemns some of his votes here, beyond defense. I can find such a text, not drawn from the Old Testament and its Jewish history and Jewish laws, but from the New Testament; a text written by the same Paul to whom he is chiefly indebted for the texts used against me.

I remind the gentleman from Putnam, that, a few days since, when there was a question whether we should absolutely prohibit, by Constitutional enactment, all public debt, or whether we should leave the door open, by submitting the matter to a popular vote, he did not vote for the absolute prohibition. He voted to leave the matter open; and so to permit, under certain conditions, an increase of debt. But if texts of Scripture are to be received, in their literal sense, as prescribing law to us, that vote of the gentleman's was unscriptural. It was contrary, not to the spirit only, but to the very words of the Christian Scriptures. For therein it is said: "Owe no man anything, but to love one another." [Laughter and applause].

Sir, I am not satisfied here to take the defensive only. I am not satisfied merely to refute the gentleman's allegation, that the change now proposed for the benefit of married women is contrary to the spirit of the Christian system. I assert that, in the general spirit and tendency of its doctrines, Christianity not only permits, —it approves and commands it.

The Author of the Christian religion always treated woman with kindness, with respect, and, even in those cases which the world's morality most bitterly condemns, with indulgence. He always treated woman as the equal of man. When Martha required that her sister should be bidden to attend to household duties, (the sole matters with which some men think women ought to concern themselves,) instead of listening, with men, to the teachings of Christian philosophy, what was his reply? "Mary hath chosen that good part which shall never be taken from her."

The whole tenor of Christian morality, the very essence of the change it made on previous systems, is the substitution of the law of kindness for the law of the stronger. It is founded on charity and on love. Love is the fulfilling of the law. Is it not meet and fitting that, under such a system, that sex of which the milder virtues are the peculiar graces, of which love, in its purest and widest acceptation, is the characteristic attribute—is it not, I say, in accordance with the very spirit of the Christian system that woman should come to be regarded as the equal of man?

In nations more barbarous, this could not be. In feudal times, when property was held in virtue of warlike service, when right and might were nearly synonymous terms, the stronger animal felt, and very naturally asserted his superiority. Among our own Aborigines, where reputation is measured by the number of scalps that hang at the red warrior's girdle, woman is naturally regarded as an inferior, a menial drudge, fit only to wait upon her savage lord. In Mahometan countries, where faith was disseminated by the sword, it was natural that she who could not wield the sword, should be denied the reward of the faithful, and excluded, as a creature without a soul, from the Moslem paradise. It is the boast, the just boast of Christianity, that its tendency has been to change all this; that it has aided in giving to woman a rank she never held before, throughout the whole history of the world; a rank which could not belong to her, in ages and in countries, where physical strength and brutal courage were regarded as the highest of human attributes; but which is hers, of right and of nature, in every land, where mind predominates over matter; where the social virtues rank higher than stout deeds on the battle field.

No man who walks through the world with his eyes open and his heart awake, but must distinguish the radical change which this mild and Christian spirit is working throughout the civilized world. It shows itself in the gradual reform of law. It is evinced in the tone of our literature. The very fugitive poetry of the day, no unfaithful reflex of popular sentiment, is imbued with it. I have a little scrap book here, in which it is my habit to place such of these lighter matters, floating on the current of the hour, and often indicating thus the direction of the great stream which is bearing us all along, as may chance to attract my attention, and seem to me worthy of more permanent record than the passing pages of a periodical. I read from a definition—a very modern one—of the often prostituted terms, hero and heroism. I know not the author's name; but, be he who he may, the lines do equal credit to his head and his heart. The first verse sets before us the heroism of the world's vocabulary; yes, even of our world, in these United States:

"With his trusty sword and shield,
Rides the warrior to the field.
For his bleeding country's wrongs,
Valiantly he goes;
Daring danger, braving death,
'Midst her tyrant foes.
If he fall, some pilgrim sad,
To his lonely grave
Will in reverence come, and bend,
Worshiping the brave.
If victorious, he will win
Laurel wreaths of fame;
While applauding multitudes
Shout the hero's name.
So, with trusty sword and shield,
Rides the warrior to the field.

The concluding verses shadow forth, in a scene too true to nature, a heroism of another character:

By a dying brother's bed
Sits a maid, and sews for bread.
When the lark's first silver note
Comes upon the air,
And when tolls the evening bell,
Ever sits she there,
Watching him, and speaking hope,
Though her soul is sad;
Dropping tears upon her task,
Yet appearing glad:
Grudging every moment's rest,
Every sleepy hour,
Yet will wander miles away,
For a way-side flower!
Few knew this, yet by his bed
Sits the maid and sews for bread.
God, who seest not in parts,
Strengthen these heroic hearts;

Those who with a strong endeavor,
Win the noblest fight,
Conquering self, and yet, all lowly,
Bend them in Thy sight.
Those who by the sacred hearth-stone,
When great trials come,
Girt with peace, and gentle voices,
Make it truly home.
Those encased in Love's strong armor,
Doing valiant deeds;
For all such true heroism
Our poor praying pleads.
Strengthen those heroic hearts,
God, who seest not in parts!

There is much in the spirit of the Christian system, though it was promulgated nearly two thousand years ago, that is greatly in advance of the practical working day opinions of the present age. Such is the sentiment, eminently Christian, embodied in the above beautiful stanzas. We admire it in poetry—we reject it in practice. Such, also, is our estimate of the position of woman in society. In theory we admit that under a system which substitutes kindness, and forgiveness, and mild persuasion for harshness, and revenge, and animal force, woman becomes man's equal; in law we utterly deny it. Our law in this, as in many other things, lags far behind the essential spirit of Christianity.

I do not argue that any where in the Christian Scriptures there is clearly expressed a preference of the civil law rule as to the property of married women over that of the common law. I but say, that if we carefully look to the general tenor and tendency of the sentiments put forth by the Author of Christianity, we shall find these far more accordant with the former than with the latter. And we shall scarcely resist the conclusion, that the feudal rule which declared the wife incapable of holding property, is a barbarous heathen relic; one of those old unjust things destined soon to pass away, and to be replaced by the just and the new.

A few words in conclusion, Mr. President, in reply to the taunt indulged in by the gentleman from Putnam, as to my religious creed.

MR. BADGER. I intended no personal allusion to the gentleman's religious opinions in anything I said.

MR. OWEN. Yet it is very certain that the Convention so understood the Delegate from Putnam (Mr. Badger) when he intimated that "some gentlemen had not more faith than was necessary in sacred things," accompanied, as that intimation was, by a significant gesture and glance at myself.

For the best and briefest reply which suggests itself to this irrelevant charge, I turn once more to my little scrap book, and ask to be allowed to read from it a few lines, by Leigh Hunt, entitled

ABOUT BEN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL.

"Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,

Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
 An angel, writing in a book of gold;
 Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
 And to the Presence in the room he said:
 'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
 And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
 Answered: 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
 'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
 Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
 But cheerily still, and said: 'I pray thee, then,
 Write me as one who loves his fellow-men.'
 The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
 He came again with a great wakening light,
 And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
 And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

When there is a question in regard to my religious opinions, be my reply this, that I adopt and endorse the sentiment of Leigh Hunt's beautiful parable.

Mr. BADGER. May I be permitted to say one or two words in reply? [Loud cries of "spoke, spoke, spoke," and "hear him," "hear him."]

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has spoken, and he is not entitled to speak again unless by the consent of the Convention.

Mr. BADGER. I would just observe to the Convention that when I spoke in the morning I only occupied twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has occupied thirty-five minutes, without being interrupted.

The PRESIDENT. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to hear the gentleman?

Cries of "hear him," and "consent, consent," from all parts of the Hall.

Mr. BADGER proceeded to say: I took a note on the gentleman from Monroe, and I have nothing further to remark in regard to him. If he has satisfied himself and the Convention with his exposition of the matter, I, of course, am satisfied.

In regard to the gentleman from Posey, perhaps I may be permitted to remark that he would have made a pretty fair preacher—of a certain kind [laughter]. He divides the words well. But while I make that remark, I must be allowed to make another, and that is, that he misapplies it much better. [Cheers and laughter.]

I am well apprised, sir, that so far as experience and learning are concerned, I have to contend against fearful odds; but my reliance is in the justice of my cause. It must be manifest to all that the honorable gentleman from Posey has totally avoided the prime question at issue. He has given us a learned dissertation on stoning those to death who picked up sticks on the Sabbath. But, sir, I confess I cannot see that it has any relevancy to the relations of husband and wife.

And notwithstanding his denial of the applicability of these texts to the point at issue, I ask what has he done better? Why, sir, he has made a noble defense, if sophistry be argument, and in making it has not touched the point at issue. He has misconstrued almost every text he has quoted.

I had thought, sir, that as the onus probandi rested on me he would come up to the work fairly. But, sir, where do we find him? We find him undertaking to prove that I gave a vote contrary to Scripture last week, in relation to restricting the Legislature in borrowing money! I had not thought, sir, that the honorable gentleman would thus decidedly beg the question. His be the distinction and his the honor, that may be gained by such a course!

The gentleman very exultingly says that in discharging my "piece," I have not evidently missed my object, but unfortunately for me the game at which I fired was killed last evening, even its brains knocked out, and the whole body dreadfully mutilated. He then very warmly entreats me, by the use of a Latin phrase, the English of which, he says, is—

"Speak ye not evil of the dead."

This kind of evasion, sir, may do well enough for the careless and unthinking, or for a badly biassed mind; but the pending question is the same animal, clothed in a little different garb, and reads as follows:

"The real and personal property of woman, whether owned before marriage, or afterwards acquired by purchase or gift, (other than from the husband in fraud of his creditors,) devise or descent, shall be and remain secured to them under equitable conditions, by law." But enough of this.

Now in relation to the law of inheritance under the Mosaic economy, he gave a misconstruction of the language of that chapter. He said that it simply proved the law of descent, and that if it did not prove that, what did it prove? This I admit; and while I admit that it proves that, it proves also what I said this forenoon—that when the daughters of Zelophehad married, their property passed into the hands of those to whom they were married, and that consequently the law compelled them to marry men who were sons of their father's tribe. This is the law in the case; but I knew that this principle and these proofs would be denied, and therefore, I stated what I did this morning. The gentleman informed me last week that he would deny them.

Although I have but little experience in discussing the Christian Scriptures, I feel gratified that I can rectify two or three misapprehensions; and in the first place let me remark that the numerous texts which we have heard quoted in relation to the duties of servants, have no connection whatever with the subject under consideration. Nobody denies that the Apostles required that servants should render duties and obedience to their masters; but does the gentleman in sober earnestness, want us to think they meant the same kind of obedience which is required of the wife? Will he dare to say that? If he does, I ask him to say it out; to say it out before this community, that all may know it. Mr. President, this is nothing more than a sound sophism. [Applause.] It is too absurd to deserve notice; for every one must see that the main thing is wanting to constitute his argument logical, and that is the total want of analogy between the position of the wife and the servant. [Applause.] I know well enough, and so does every man, that there are relative duties appertaining to masters and servants, and to husbands and wives, as well as to parents and children; but the question in dispute is whether the Christian Scriptures recognize a separate interest between husband and wife. [Several voices, "that's the question," and "go on, go on."] Do the Christian Scriptures recognize a distinct and separate interest in the holding, disposing of, employing, and handling personality and realty between the husband and the wife? This is the question. Has the gentleman met it, or has he avoided it? I appeal to you, sir, and to this Convention, for an answer. For in all candor, his speech seems to me to be a kind of last resort, a kind of desperate effort to save the last fragments of a depreciated socialism.

But I want to instruct the gentleman a little in regard to his observations concerning the Sermon on the Mount. In that sermon, true enough, we find the words which he quoted: "Blessed are the meek;" and up comes the gentleman with all his gravity and exclaims, "who are the meek? Why the women." [Laughter.] Agreed that they are; and did the Lord intend to say that they should inherit this earth? Or did he look down the long and dark vista of the future to that period, of which Peter speaks, when he says:

"We look for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

[Applause, and "go ahead."]

"Ah! but" says he, "the gentleman from Putnam gave a grievously erroneous vote the other day." What was it? "Why he voted for a provision to enable the people to borrow money when the public wants required it." Yes, sir, I did vote that way, and would vote the same way nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of every thousand. [Applause.] I hold it to be true, that the people are the sons of the soil; and we are only their instruments here. We are not the people, as some gentlemen have boldly asserted; we are only the instruments of that people on whom we depend for prosperity and happiness, as members of this great community. And are we to say to the people "you shall not have the privilege of borrowing a dollar when your necessities require that you should do so." This is not our province, although some gentleman have so regarded it.

But the gentleman quotes this text: "owe no man anything," to show the erroneousness of my position on that subject. Now for the point, what is it? "Owe no man anything," says Paul in the thirteenth chapter to the Romans, "but love one another." Now if the gentleman from Posey had studied the divine oracles, as most men would conclude that he had, from his eloquence to-day, he would not have misrepresented them quite so much as he has. I must say, however, that last week I gave the gentleman all the texts I had selected. Yes; sir, I gave him a copy of every one of them, and it seems to me that if he had reflected at all, he ought not so miserably to have misconstrued the one he selected from the Sermon on the Mount. Now, what was the object of this remark of the Apostle, "owe no man anything." Do gentlemen regard a man as "owing" a thing until it is due? Answer me that ye men of law. [Several voices, "no, no, no."] I take occasion to say here that this construction is quite as contrary to the genius and spirit of the Christian Scriptures as the subject matter under discussion; just the same. Sir, desperate must be the cause that requires, in order to its sustenance, so manifestly gross a violation of the spirit and import of this divine record. Did the Apostle mean that men were under no circumstances to promise money. No, sir, no; he simply meant to put a check to that system of fraud which is too frequently a distinguishing feature in the character of men and communities. And it is not the contracting a debt, sir, but the refusal to pay, that renders a man disreputable both in the eyes of the law of God and man. [Applause.] I have now about finished my remarks, and will close with two other remarks, which shall be short.

The Bible has not unfrequently been adverted to in this Hall. I am pleased to hear reference made to it; and I must say, that so far as it has been adverted to, gentlemen have adverted to it with becoming reverence, with few exceptions.

And now, sir, so far as this matter has gone, I am still convinced of the truth of the position I have maintained. I hold it to be self evident, that this Convention should have nothing whatever to do with the proposition, now under consideration. I hold it to be altogether foreign to the object for which we came here—that we did not come here to ingraft on our fundamental law any such proposition. It is neither our duty nor our province to do so, although we may regard it as our privilege.

In conclusion I will say to this Convention, that in future, I should be extremely pleased if nothing was presented here but those matters which legitimately belong to the instrument for the revision of which we are here employed.

Mr. MURRAY. My highest ambition is to know and to do the will of my constituents. I have expressed my opinion with reference to this subject to a number of members and other gentlemen, which I will now briefly rehearse—comprehending the whole in three things:

A man who marries a woman for money, deserves not the protection of law, to enable him to retain it, if he has acted upon a mercenary principle.

A man who marries a woman from affection and esteem, will be able to control the means of his wife, either with or without law.

And the man who misuses the confidence of his wife, ought not to possess her property—he ought to be excluded by law. [Applause.]

I offer these conclusions for my speech.

Mr. KELSO. There is a motion pending to re-commit with instructions, which amounts to an amendment. I will move to lay the motion to re-commit with instructions, upon the table.

Mr. RARIDEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. KELSO. If the gentleman desires to speak, I withdraw.

Mr. ROBINSON said,—

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I made the motion to commit the section, I made a few brief remarks, giving my reasons for wishing to have the section stricken out, and the one that I proposed adopted in its stead. Fearing, however, that the true question may be lost sight of, after the theological display which we have just witnessed, I will ask the indulgence of the Convention a few moments, for the purpose of saying a few words on the motion to commit. And may I not say that a subject so general in its character, involving, as it does, the blessings of domestic life, deserves to be candidly considered, and that we should not adopt a rash, untried experiment, involving such high and vital interests, without at least a full and patient examination. I am well aware, sir, that such is the feeling of impatience that prevails in this Hall, that, unless a question or debate carries with it something that is amusing, there can hardly be secured for it a fair hearing, even upon its merits.

If there is any subject, sir, that should interest the mind, it is the one now before the Convention. If there is anything on earth worth preserving or being preserved, it is domestic happiness in the family circle. Strike the idea of domestic happiness out of existence—take from us the blessings of social enjoyment around the family hearth, as they are enjoyed when secured and sanctified by love and affection, and, I repeat what I have already said, there is nothing worth living for.

I object to the section as amended by the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Blythe,) and I think my objections are well founded. I object to it, sir, because I believe, if finally adopted, it will endanger those peaceable and happy relations which should be cherished and sustained by all well disposed towards happiness and good order. Sir, the section proposes to invest the wife with separate property—to create between her and her husband, separate, and to some extent, rival interests, which, I fear, might interrupt that peace and harmony which ought to be permitted to flow in one even and unbroken stream.

Sir, in all ages of the world, and in all the relations of life, property has had its alluring and corrupting influences; and permit me to ask the question, what is there to justify us in coming to the conclusion, that, if we adopt this section, thereby setting up in the same family, different and conflicting interests; bringing, as it must in some instances, the interest of the husband and wife in contact, it will not create in many instances difficulties, turmoils, and discord, which should be deprecated by all orderly and well-disposed members of community.

What, sir, does the section proposed to be referred, contain? It contains a provision that the wife may acquire and hold property in her own right, and that her property, whether acquired before or after marriage, shall be under her control, and subject to her own disposal. This would give her the right to manage her own property. It would be dividing the house against itself, and setting up in the same family government, two separate branches. Who, sir, cannot foresee the consequences that such a state of affairs may produce?

But, suppose you secure to the woman separate property, what would be the consequence? How is it to be managed and taken care of? Her situation and habits in life will not justify her in taking upon herself the burthen of managing and taking care of it. She must perform this duty through her husband, or some other agent; and might not this bring with it disquietude and strife, that would embitter the enjoyments of domestic life, and plant thorns in that path that, above all paths, should be smooth and even? Sir, I fear the experiment.

But, Mr. President, the amendment to the section, made by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) though done from the best and purest of motives, doubtless; for, Mr. President, I am too well acquainted with that delegate to suppose him capable of doing wrong designedly; yet, I repeat, that it makes the section more than ever objectionable. Sir, the original section provided that the woman should have the right to acquire property, real and personal, by gift, grant, purchase, devise, or descent; but by the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) it is provided that she shall not hold property by gift from her husband, made in fraud of his creditors. How often, sir, might it occur that the husband, to defraud his creditors, would attempt to place his property in the hands of his wife? How, then, is this question of fraud to be tried?—where, and by what form is it to be settled? Not by the law of Moses, referred to by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr.

Badger). It must be tried before the legal tribunals of the country, and, Mr. President, the creditor, to secure his debt, attacks one of these business transactions between husband and wife. He charges fraud, and the woman asserts her title to the property thus acquired, and this question of fraud, growing out of a transaction between husband and wife, must be settled in a court of justice.

I now ask the question, sir; I now appeal to the delegates on this floor, if they are ready for such results—for litigation of this sort. Pass the section—make it a part of the organic law—and my word for it, you lay the foundation for the most fruitful field of unhappy litigation, growing out of the most sacred relation in life. The discordant hand of the law in this way will be the agent that will invade the only peaceful retreat for which life is worth retaining. I admire, sir, the good feelings that have produced the section. I hold myself to be one that feels devoted to the rights of woman. But, sir, fearing, as I do, the experiment—fearing that it would produce heart burnings and discord between man and wife—I must, as it now stands, vote against it.

I desire here, Mr. President, to say one word in regard to the proposition immediately before the Convention. I made a few remarks when I submitted the proposition. I then stated that our law of descent was wrong—that it did not do justice to the married woman, and ought to be altered. To that opinion I still adhere. Sir, the married relation may well be assimilated to a partnership; it is that union of interest by which the partners should share in profit and loss; for it would not be fair—it would not be just—to exempt property to the woman—place it beyond the reach of her husband's debts, when, perhaps, those debts have been contracted for the mutual benefit of both. Sir, if she participates in the advantages growing out of his good contracts, the property of the firm ought not to be exempt from the liquidation and fulfilment of the bad ones. I concede the fact, that the law of descent, as it now stands, does woman great injustice; I believe it operates towards her harshly; she ought to have justice; and there is a proper time, and a proper way, in which it should be secured to her. That time is when death has severed the tie that binds those mutual interests; when the silken cord is cut; when death has deprived her of the assistance of the husband; when there is no danger of destroying the peace, harmony, and tranquillity of domestic happiness; then, sir, let the law of descent be so regulated as to do her ample justice. The amendment that I propose will do her that justice. It proposes that a woman residing in this State, at the time of her husband's death, shall have the right to claim free, and discharged from his debts, an amount of property not to exceed in value the sum of three hundred dollars, and one-half the balance after the payment of his debts. This will allow her a small pittance on which to support and sustain a family left on her hands, and a fair portion of his property after the payment of his debts. This, sir, is right; this is giving to her a fair portion of the partnership effects after death has dissolved the partnership, and put an end to that relation most to be cherished; the balance to go to his children in the regular and ordinary line of descent. This amendment strikes at the proper point. It avoids all the danger, the principal objection to the section, as it now stands, and the evils it might produce in the family circle. The amendment disturbs not those relations, but allows them to flow on in an uninterrupted stream until the relation ends. One word, sir, in regard to my friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark). He says that he is in favor of my proposition—believes it right—but is opposed to putting it in the Constitution. In this, I think, he is wrong.

This principle should be fully settled; this right should be well defined and understood; it should be permanently fixed. If we leave it to legislation, it will be vacillating. Establish it in the Constitution, and it will be fixed and certain—as durable as the Constitution itself.

Aid and assist the wife, then, after she is left to provide for herself. This proposition, it appears to me, seems to correspond with the principles of justice more than any other. I hope the section will be referred with the instructions which I have proposed. I hope it will be stricken out and amended as I have proposed, thereby doing ample justice to the wife at the proper time, and not hazarding interests more sacred and more valuable than property or wealth.

These views, sir, I submit with all candor, and are such as I have come to after a deliberate consideration of the subject. Other gentlemen have a right to think and act for themselves; and so they ought to act; I dictate to none.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. It seems to me that there must be a proper time when the question should be taken upon all measures brought before a deliberative body, and I think upon this question, that time has already past. I think this question has been argued long enough and that certainly, before this time, gentlemen have been enabled to present all the views which they can reasonably desire to present in regard to this matter. Therefore I call for the previous question.

And there was a second—affirmative 66; negative 36.

The main question having been ordered to be now taken—

The PRESIDENT said: The main question is—shall the section be read a third time?

Mr. ROBINSON. Is not the first question upon my amendment?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. The gentleman's amendment is embraced in a motion to re-commit, and the rule cuts off all motions.

Mr. KELSO. I have simply one favor to ask, to which it seems to me there can be no objection. If the question, by unanimous consent, can be taken upon the amendments, I believe the mover of the amendment would be willing to strike out from it the word "purchase."

SEVERAL VOICES. "No, no," "Go on with the call."

The yeas and nays were then taken under the rule, and the Secretary announced the vote—yeas, 66; nays, 59—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Thomas, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—66.

[Before the vote was announced—

Mr. BADGER rose in his place, and asked leave to vote, but he was precluded by the rule, which requires the member to have been within the bar when his name was called.]

So the section as amended was passed the third reading, and ordered to be referred to the committee on revision.

COUNTY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT said: The next thing in order, is the consideration of the first section of the report submitted on the 29th of October by the Chairman of the committee on county and township organizations, (Mr. Smith of Ripley,) which the Secretary will read:

SECTION 1. There shall be elected in each county by the qualified electors thereof, a Sheriff, Coroner, Recorder, County Auditor, County Treasurer, and a Clerk of the Circuit Court, at the time and places of holding elections for members of the General Assembly. The Clerk, Auditor, and Recorder, shall each continue in office four years, and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified. But no person shall be eligible to the office of Clerk, Recorder, or Auditor, more than eight years in any term of twelve years. The Sheriff, Coroner, and Treasurer, shall each continue in office two years and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Sheriff or Treasurer more than four years in any term of six years.

The PRESIDENT. The first question pending is upon the following amendment of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden):

Strike out all after the word "provided," and insert:

"Nothing herein contained, shall be construed to prevent county officers now in office from serving during the term fixed by the new Constitution when their terms run beyond that period."

Mr. WALPOLE. I move to amend the amendment by way of substitute—striking out all after the word "provided," in the original section, and inserting the following words:

"That the present incumbents shall continue in the duties of their respective offices until said officers are superseded under the authority of the new Constitution."

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that the operation of the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) would be unjust. The object of my amendment is simply to provide that all officers now in office, and such as may be elected before the amended Constitution goes into effect, shall serve during the term fixed in the new Constitution, in all cases where their terms run beyond that period, provided, they are willing so to do. But the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock, if I understand it correctly from the reading, is that all officers shall go out under the new Constitution, and submit to the chances of a re-election. Now I have one observation to make in regard to this matter. I believe that the officers of state, the judges of the Supreme Court, and the circuit judges, should go out under the new Constitution, but I am opposed to the idea that county officers should all be turned out. I think this course would be unreasonable and unjust. If this rule were to be once established, whenever the question might be agitated for the call of a Convention to amend the Constitution, at any time in the future, you would, of course, enlist all who wish to come into office in favor of a call for a Convention. And there are always many persons in every county who would be anxious that a general turn out might take place, to make room for themselves and their friends. It has been said by many leading men in the State of New York that many counties in that State went for calling a Convention, for no other purpose than this. But this Convention by permitting all persons now in office, to serve out the length of time fixed by the new Constitution, would most effectually check this feeling. For instance, where a county clerk has been elected for seven years, just before the new Constitution goes into effect, he should serve for four years. In this way you would completely discourage the desire which exists in many minds, to call a Convention, simply for the purpose of throwing out all the incumbents of office and open the door for a general scramble to obtain them; I hope, sir, that we shall make such a Constitution as that the people will have no desire, soon, to call another Convention. Conventions are designed for curing dangerous diseases in the body politic, and for removing great evils, while to the ordinary legislation of the country belongs the care of the less dangerous diseases, and the removal of lesser evils. When you call a Convention, for the remedy of the lesser evils, in the affairs of State, you virtually make the medicine of the Constitution its daily bread.

But I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock for another reason. It is unjust. These men who have just been elected to office under the old Constitution, and have just entered upon the discharge of their official duties, having, perhaps, changed their residence for this purpose, and otherwise involved themselves in contract by their change of situation, could not be turned out without loss and disappointment on the part of themselves and their friends; and I do not believe the people have expected such injustice at our hands. I am willing to except the amendment as explained by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) that is, that the men in office shall serve out their Constitutional time under the new Constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. Having been upon the committee which reported this section, I will state that when the subject was under discussion in committee it was decided not to report any clause of this nature, because there would have to be a general clause inserted in the Constitution, which would have respect to every officer in the State. It should be recollected that we have decided upon biennial elections, and therefore the committee thought the term of these offices ought to be made to terminate, so that their successors could be elected at some general election. But the main reason which influenced the committee not to propose such a clause here, was, that they decided to leave the matter to be embraced in a general provision. I grant that it would be a temporary evil to turn out all officers, and especially those who shall have been just elected before the new Constitution shall be declared to be in force; but if we require those terms of office to expire so that they can be filled at the period of some general election, the inconvenience could be avoided to a great extent.

Mr. TAYLOR. I had hoped, sir, that this Convention would take some course looking more to the great interests of the State than the subject matter of this discussion—than the question whether it is better to let all the officers of the State and the counties go out one after another for the next seven years, or whether it is better to say, "all broken loose" to all the officers of the body politic. And it is a little singular to me that gentlemen should think of any influence which these questions might have upon the acceptance or rejection of the new Constitution, or that by a general turn out of officers we might beget an influence which might convene other Constitutional Conventions for the benefit of office-seekers. But this is a new idea to my mind. I have been taught that with respect to office-holders the "ins" had more power than the "outs." And I think it is certainly time that if we bring in a new swarm of officers under the new Constitution, that they will have more power with reference to the subject of another Convention than those whose wings have been clipped. This is not a new principle, sir. We find that the President of the United States, with the patronage in his hands, is frequently able to keep himself in power if he desires it. This has been the history of the country.

But I do not think this question ought to figure in this Convention. It is too small a consideration for us here to spend our time talking about a few years servitude as a clerk or sheriff. Still, if it is right that the judges should go out, since the office of a judge is not worth so much as that of a sheriff, it seems to me that by a parity of reasoning the sheriff and the clerk should also go out. But this is all a time-serving business to come here and consider such questions. I am opposed, upon general principles, to a seven years' term; and I hope that no clerk or other officer will be continued any longer than he would be permitted to serve under the new Constitution, if the people should adopt it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hold that the people are bound to good faith as well as individuals. There is, in every office, an implied contract between the officer and the people. On the part of the officer that contract is, that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his office, and on the part of the people, that he shall hold the office and receive the emoluments thereof, till the term expires, unless reasons of public policy interfere. I do not say that we have not the power to do what the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock proposes. I would not dispute that. But may it not be questioned whether we have a legal right to do so under the Constitution of the United States, in any case where we do not change the character or term of the office?

It would certainly be a questionable power on the part of the Legislature where the office is created by the Legislature or on the part of the people, where the office is created by the Constitution for the Legislature in the one case, or the people in the other, to turn one man out of office during his term for the purpose of putting another in, where no change is made in the term or duties of the office, or in the mode of selecting the officer. I do not say that where the public good requires it, that the proper authority in the State may not change the character of the office, the mode of selecting the person to fill it, or abolish the office—and in either case there would be strong reasons for the incumbent going out. But the section to which the amendment is offered makes no change in the nature of the office provided for therein, nor in the mode of selecting the officer; and the duties of the officer will be the same under the amended Constitution as under the old.

But if it were admitted that we have this right, still it would not be acting in good faith to exercise it. Such an action on our part has not been expected by any officer, and, so far as my knowledge extends, the people have not demanded it.

Gentlemen say we will rule out and commence anew. But I do not understand that to have been the intention of the people. We do not change the form of government when we amend the Constitution; it is still the same Constitution though amended, and the same State government.

But, leaving that out of the question, it would be good policy to let the present incumbents of those offices be left over till their terms expire, for if we say to them all, you shall go out and we will elect anew at the first general election under the new Constitution, which will come on in the year 1852, we will then have to elect a Governor, all the officers of State, of the Judiciary, and county officers, at the same time that we shall be called upon to vote for a President of the United States; and so mixing all up together. Besides, I say it is not wise to provide that all the officers throughout the State shall be elected at the same time. We are to have annual elections, I suppose, and we ought to have as few officers to elect at the same time as possible; for if we were to elect all the officers throughout the State at the same time, the importance of selecting good county officers would be swallowed up and lost in the interest which would be excited in consequence of the election of Governor or President. Every four years, under such an arrangement, you would have to elect all the officers which I have enumerated, at the same time. I cannot conceive that it would be wise in us to establish such a state of things. I would prefer to let the Sheriffs go out one year, the Clerks the next, and the Treasurers the next. I cannot advocate biennial elections. That is a new idea to all, although the people have demanded biennial sessions of the Legislature.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I have some objections to the change of these officers whom the people have elected. I consider that in remodeling the Constitution there is a wide difference between those officers who have heretofore derived their official existence from the Legislature, and those other officers who have been elected by the people. I am willing to draw this distinguishing line between such officers as shall have been elected by the voice of the people and those whose election has heretofore fallen on the Legislature, or who have derived their office by other means. I am willing that these latter should come under the curtailing operation of the new Constitution. But I have never yet been able to see the reason why men selected for office by the people, should be turned out. For such individuals are selected to perform certain public duties on account of the confidence which the people have reposed in their ability and integrity. Therefore I think the Convention would be traveling beyond the line of their duty to turn them out. We propose only, to place it in the power of the people to elect such officers as have not hitherto been elected by them. But if gentlemen are disposed to turn out all the officers throughout the State, let them remember that the Clerks, Sheriffs, Auditors, and Recorders, will be found everywhere opposing the new Constitution most heartily, and exercising an influence of a most potent character, which will be felt in every county in the State. They know too, very well, how to exercise an influence of this kind, and they will feel that their rights and privileges have been trenchd upon enough to stimulate them to be active. I hope, therefore, that no attempt will be made to shorten the terms of those officers who have received their places by the votes of the people. If the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock shall be voted down, I shall propose another amendment which will allow all the elections to harmonize. The elections may be biennial, if necessary, and still there need be no official vacancy occurring which may not be filled by the people.

Mr. WALPOLE. There are two arguments which have been offered against my amendment. One is, that the incumbents of office have vested rights in them, and therefore it would be contrary to the Constitution of the United States to turn them out. And the other is the ground taken by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) that we should hold up the Constitution to the highest bidder; that if we adopt this principle in the Constitution hundreds of office holders in the State will turn out and electioneer against its acceptance by the people.

In answer to the proposition to make this Constitution suit the views of the highest bidder, I tell these gentlemen that there are hundreds out of office where there is one in office; and if he desires to make the Constitution popular, he should cater for the tastes of the greatest number of bidders. But it is with reference to a question of right that I have introduced my proposition. The people have said that they will revolutionize the old Constitution and set up a new order of things, so that what had been right under the old may be reversed under the new. The same duties may not be required of officers under the new Constitution which were required under the old. Nor the same rights may not be reserved under both. You do not reserve the same rights to the citizens, nor prescribe the same duties. The relation between husband and wife have been very materially changed to-day. You have changed the right to the possession of property from the husband to the wife; and now those gentlemen who bolted against voting upon that question come in here and assert the doctrine of vested rights in offices.

The gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) says that the election of the various offices in the State should be taken at broken doses; that the election of a clerk, auditor, sheriff, and recorder should be taken at different elections, so that the people could manage them, asking no favors; that when we throw all four together an undue influence will be brought to bear upon the freedom of elections.

The provision which I have offered, has been selected from a clause in the third section of the twelfth article of the present Constitution, which prescribes that the incumbents of officers under the territorial government shall perform all the duties of their respective departments, until they were superseded by elections or appointments under the authority of the Constitution. This is the principle upon which my amendment proceeds, prescribing that the present incumbents of office shall hold over until they shall be superseded under the authority of the new Constitution; and it places all the officers throughout the State upon the same platform. It does not make fish of one and flesh of another. Besides, it is contemplated that all public officers shall take an oath to support the Constitution; and an oath to support the old Constitution can contain no requisition to support the new Constitution. Any State officer swearing to support the old Constitution would be bound to support a Constitution abrogated and repealed. There would be then some necessity for a new set of officers and another administration of the oath, which exists always in the case of a revolution in any government. But, Mr. President, let me instance a case showing the injustice of the operation of the gentleman's rule of holding over. Suppose, at the next August election there should be elected a clerk of the court, who, under the present Constitution, would be entitled to hold seven years; and then, under the new Constitution, he could serve four years longer, making eleven years in all. Here would be a manifest inequality and injustice, because his neighbor, in the adjoining county, could not serve in the same office more than eight years. I am for placing all the officers throughout the State upon the same platform.

Mr. KELSO. Mr. President—

Mr. BORDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question?

Mr. KELSO. Yes, I will yield for that.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to ask the Chair whether I can accept the proposition of the gentleman from Switzerland?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that the gentleman can accept.

Mr. WALPOLE (to Mr. Borden). You are a little too late. I moved to strike out first.

Mr. BORDEN. I accept of the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. WALPOLE. I rise to a point of order, and I submit that the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) cannot accept, because my amendment has preference.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the gentleman has a right to perfect his own amendment as an original proposition.

Mr. WALPOLE. The Chair is right. But my proposition to strike out commences precisely at the same point with that of the gentleman's, and being offered first, the first question, of course, is first upon mine.

Mr. KELSO (resuming). Be that as it may, I am not going to yield the floor. I am sorry that we, who are in favor of amendments to this proposition, cannot agree among ourselves. I cannot concur fully neither with the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) nor the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). I deny that there is any such thing as a contract between those who choose him. I say there is no contract, although I admit that there is an obligation of good faith, that the officer elected shall serve out his term. But, sir, all individual interest must yield to great public interests. For example, although a man may have been elected to the office of clerk of the circuit court, to serve for a term of seven years, yet if the court, in the mean time, shall change the term of his office, I contend that it is not proper for him to hold over so long as the term of seven years, if under the new Constitution, the term has been shortened. On the other hand, I contend that it is impolitic and ungenerous, and certainly it is unnecessary, to turn out all county officers because, forsooth, we have made a new Constitution.

In reply to the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) with reference to the Constitutional oath;—what is that oath? That gentleman has been long in office, and has some idea of it. It is to support the Constitution of the State of Indiana—not the new Constitution, or the old Constitution—not a Constitution which may be made hereafter, nor a Constitution which has been made heretofore. We suppose that a man takes the Constitutional oath, which applies to an office, the term of which reaches to seven years, and in the mean time, we present to the people a new Constitution, and they adopt it, what is that but the Constitution of the State of Indiana? And I ask if the oath in such a case, is not as obligatory upon the officer to support the new Constitution, as it was to support the old one. It certainly is, and he must support the new Constitution or violate that oath. To my mind, then, the argument of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) is all labor lost.

Is it possible that we have been assembled here, at the public expense, to remain some ten or fifteen weeks, merely for the purpose of turning men out of office throughout the State, in order that others may come in. I ask, sir, if this is not a small business, for us to be employed here, consigning all these little county officers to private life.

In my portion of the State we have nothing to fear from any course which may be taken. In the county of Ohio, they have elected a clerk, who can easily beat any other two men in the county. And in the county of Switzerland, we shall elect our officers at the time when the new Constitution will probably go into effect; therefore we can lose nothing. But I see no propriety in turning out every county officer, until they shall complete the term of service prescribed in the new Constitution. They are all now legitimately in their places, and for this body to take it upon themselves to turn them out, seems to me to be going beyond the business which we have been sent here to do; and, besides, it is rather a smaller business than I am willing to embark in. I hope, therefore, that the last amendment offered, will be adopted, which is in the following language:

“That nothing herein contained, shall prevent the person now holding the several offices in this section named, from serving out the term for which they may have been elected, when such term, or remainder of a term, shall not exceed a full term under this Constitution—but in no case shall any officer now in office, or at any time elected before the taking effect of this Constitution, serve for a longer term, than a regular term, as provided in this Constitution.”

With reference to this idea of biennial elections—elections but once in two years—I am constrained to say it is sheer folly. We must, and will have, annual elections. It is a duty which we owe to ourselves, and which should not be neglected, as we value our free institutions.

It was well remarked by the gentlemen from Shelby, (Mr. Hendricks,) that it would be bad policy to proceed to the election of all our officers at one single election. The election for the adoption or rejection of the new Constitution should certainly take place about the first of next May, provided, we shall be able to prepare the Constitution by that time. Then, in all probability, the time for annual elections will be changed from August until October, giving ample time for canvassing, before the first election under the new Constitution.

Some gentlemen insist that all the officers should go out under the new Constitution; but I am with the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) upon that subject. I think that all the officers, with reference to whom we shall change the mode of election, should be subjected to a recollection; that is, where we take an election from one source and give it to another.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I claim the indulgence of the House only for a few minutes' speech. And now, Mr. President, the first declaration which I shall make is, that, notwithstanding the gentleman has made a good argument, his proposition is the most absurd thing which has been made to this Convention; and if I do not demonstrate this to the satisfaction—

Mr. WALPOLE (interrupting). I desire to know whether the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) alludes to my proposition.

Mr. SMITH. No, sir. You are pretty near right in this. But, now, the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) proposes that these officers shall hold over for four years. Let us take an example. Suppose a sheriff, clerk, or a recorder, who hold their office for seven years, should be elected so that their term would run some one or two years beyond the proclamation of the new Constitution. The gentleman asks us here to add to their term of service four years, which, we suppose, is the term prescribed for these officers in the new Constitution.

Mr. KELSO. If the gentleman could not understand my proposition better, it were better for him to say nothing about it. I said that such county officers should hold a clear term of four years under the new Constitution, provided, the balance of their term should reach to that; but that none should go beyond it.

Mr. SMITH. Very good, then. I stand corrected upon that point. The gentleman proposes that they shall not go beyond the clear term of four years, which is the term of these offices under the new Constitution. But I take issue upon that point. The gentleman's doctrine is, that this Convention have a right to appoint officers under the new Constitution.

Mr. KELSO (in his seat). I did not say so.

Mr. SMITH. I know that. But I hold the doctrine that when this Constitution goes into effect, all the officers under the old Constitution go out, and that any person having received an office under the old Constitution, if he be continued in office, he must hold by virtue of the appointment of this body.

In regard to the proposition that the oath taken to support the present Constitution may be transferred to any Constitution which we may adopt, I take this position: That, if we but insert one fundamental provision in the new Constitution which was not in the old, it is sufficient to constitute the instrument a new Constitution. I hold that an officer who swears to support the new Constitution, should know technically and really what he is swearing to support; and there might be such a thing as a provision in the new Constitution which an officer of the old Constitution would not be willing to swear to support. Then, if we legislate those men out of office, and legislate them in again, we must require them to support the Constitution which we make, and for this reason, I say, there will be created, technically, a new set of officers.

But, Mr. President, how is it that because a man is elected to office he should be continued, and that another officer, who is not elected, but appointed to his place, shall go out. Some gentlemen have insisted that it is a small business to make these discriminations. But this does not effect my position, because I insist that they go out per se. But since it is a fact that the office of circuit court judge is not worth so much as the office of a sheriff of a county, it might, with some reason, be thought a small business, so far as compensation is concerned, to turn out the judge and retain a sheriff.

I will now refer to the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). I have no objection to that amendment, but it will affect nothing if we adopt it. For all the present incumbents of office must hold over until they are superseded, and that is all the purpose of the amendment. I have only one objection to it, and that is this: I object to the adoption of a provision of this kind at the end of every section, respecting the rights, duties, and tenures of office-holders. Would it not be much better to cover the whole ground by one single provision, than to attach the same provision at the end of every section of the Constitution? I think it would be better for the gentleman to withdraw his amendment, although I have no objection to the object of it.

Mr. WALPOLE. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith). If the principle of my amendment be adopted into the Constitution, no matter where, or how many times, it will be the duty of the committee on revision to put it in its proper place.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) who says, that officers holding over having once taken the Constitutional oath, it remains forever binding. But I think that when the Constitution is repealed the obligation of the oath ceases. I will address him now as a lawyer, and ask him if in a case where rights and duties are held and acquired under a statutory provision, and the statute is repealed, whether the rights and duties are not also repealed? And if this question must be answered in the affirmative, I ask if it is not clear that in the case where an officer takes an oath to support the Constitution, and the Constitution is abrogated, the duty which the oath imposes to support the Constitution also ceases?

Mr. KELSO. Let me remind the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) that there is a principle which prevails in governments as wise as our own, that the king never dies, and that the corresponding principle which we have borrowed from those governments is, that the State is never without a Constitution. And if the Constitution exists all the while, I ask when the obligation of an oath to support the Constitution ceases?

Mr. BORDEN. I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I appeal to the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) to withdraw that motion, and let us settle this question now.

But Mr. BORDEN adhering to his motion—
The Convention adjourned till Friday morning, 9 o'clock.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. COOPER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. NEWMAN presented a memorial of the religious society of Friends of Indiana, yearly meeting, and said, It is due, Mr. President, to the memorialists to state that this memorial is from a highly respectable religious body of citizens of the most worthy and estimable character. I have been informed by those having satisfactory means of knowing, that the whole number of members of this society in this State, may safely be set down at fifteen thousand, and having about three thousand voters, and if the measures they refer to in this memorial shall be adopted by this Convention, as a part of the amended Constitution, it will not receive their support, and we may calculate that all the votes they cast will be cast against its adoption.

I mention this not to deter members from casting their votes as they may think, after mature reflection, is right, but that they may weigh the risk they run, of having our labors rejected by the people, if we should incorporate into our new Constitution, provisions so odious or unpopular with large bodies of our people.

These people are not political abolitionists. They are an order-loving, law-abiding people. They submit to all the laws of the land; those which they can yield a direct support to, they cheerfully render obedience to. They have never been found resisting the laws of the land.

A good government they are ever ready to support. If any provision of law comes in conflict with their conscientious scruples, they make no resistance, but submit to it, as all good citizens should do. They are an important branch of our population, and contribute largely to the support of the State. They support their own poor. They do not allow the public to contribute one iota to the support of any of their denomination. No such thing is to be found in the State or in their society, in any country where it exists, as a friend of this Order becoming a public charge upon the country. This memorial comes from what is termed the orthodox society of Friends. There is another denomination called the Hicksites, consisting of a much smaller number. In this matter to which the memorial refers both societies agree. Neither of them are political abolitionists. There is another branch that is called the anti-slavery Friends; they have organized a separate and independent society. They are in favor of carrying their opposition to slavery into their politics. With them, however, this branch of the society (the orthodox Friends) has no sympathy whatever, so far as political action is concerned. They have some feeling in regard to the question of negro slavery, but they do not participate in the views of the political abolitionist. I hope, therefore, that a kindly consideration will be given to this memorial. I will state, in addition, that they have been at the expense of having it printed, and that a copy will be laid upon the desk of each member; and that a deputation, consisting of several respectable members of the society, have come to Indianapolis for the purpose of laying this matter before the Convention, and of conferring with members upon the subject. I move that the memorial be referred to the committee of ten, one from each Congressional district.

Mr. RARIDEN said, Coming, Mr. President, as I do, from that most respectable county of Wayne, from whence this memorial emanates, and for many years having enjoyed the confidence of the memorialists, I feel that it is due to myself fully and clearly to define the position which I occupy on the momentous question embraced in the memorial, or at least so far as the prohibition of colored immigration to this State is concerned; although the present instant is the first I heard of the memorial, yet the subject is not new to my thoughts.

The society of Friends is a pure benevolent and Christian people, full of the milk of human kindness towards this degraded and out cast race; and they have at all times borne a zealous, steady, and Christian testimony against the evils of slavery, and all its demoralizing and concomitant evils, and through that have done more to rouse the moral feelings of Christendom against its wickedness, than all other societies combined. For that reason great respect and consideration is due to their suggestions; and I hope all that my colleague (Mr. Newman) has asked for the memorial will be readily yielded.

The subject of colored immigration to the State has long occupied my mind, and painfully occupied it, and while I commiserate and deplore the wrongs which that helpless race have been doomed to receive at the hands of the white man, as I trust all do, yet I must say that it is settled in my mind that the black- and white man cannot live together upon terms of equality, and that living together upon any other terms is mutually injurious and tends to the degradation of both, and here let me add, that whilst it gives me great pain to be compelled to disregard suggestions coming from such a source, and upon a subject so vitally connected with the future reputation of my State for wisdom and humanity, yet feeling and believing as I do, that it is humanity to both races to take the incipient step for their final separation, and as I am acting for posterity, I shall be constrained to disregard their suggestions on the point of prohibiting their future immigration to the State, in regard to the few poor souls amongst us. Under the guaranties and protection of our own laws, I say let justice and humanity vie with each other in their behalf. This is my position, and I shall most probably maintain it to the end, and in maintaining it against these suggestions, I say with a hero of poetry :

"Although this cloud is thunder's worst,
And charged to crush me, let it burst.
I am no changeling, 'tis too late."

Mr. BORDEN. After what has been said by the gentleman from Wayne, I will merely add, that I shall be glad to see this petition receive the respectful consideration of this body, as well as of the committee to which it is to be referred. It should be borne in mind by the House, that the persons who come forward with this petition, are not abolitionists. They have never associated with that portion of the society of Friends, and should not, therefore, be identified with them. These persons have never forfeited their political integrity; they have honestly acted with the political party to which they belong, and I think their representations are entitled to receive a more respectful consideration at our hands, than if they came from persons setting themselves up in opposition to the laws of the country. Another remark, and I am done. The persons who are here as a committee, are authorized to act for the Society. From the origin of the Society they have been accustomed, at their yearly meetings, to appoint a certain number, as a committee, to attend to the governmental affairs of the Society. In consequence of our entertaining certain propositions, they have directed this remonstrance to be forwarded, expressive of their views in reference to those propositions. They are an unobtrusive people, not disposed, as the gentleman from Wayne has observed, to set themselves in opposition to the laws of the country. On the contrary, they are disposed to yield obedience to the laws. I hope that the Convention will give to the memorial a respectful consideration, to which I think it is justly entitled.

The question was taken on the motion to refer the memorial to the select committee already appointed, and was on division—ayes 65, noes not counted—agreed to.

Mr. READ of Monroe, from the committee on corporations, other than banking, reported a section in substance as follows: That corporations shall not be created by special acts, but may be formed under general laws; and all laws conferring corporate powers may be altered from time to time, or repealed.

The section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALL. I rise to make a personal explanation. I find that my position has been misunderstood in regard to the question of permitting negroes to immigrate into the State and to hold property. I will read the passage which purports to contain my views upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman complain of any action on the part of the Convention.

Mr. HALL. Not at all, sir.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman is not correctly reported, it is a matter between him and the Reporters, and one which it is not proper to occupy the time of the Convention in rectifying.

Mr. OWEN gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, move an amendment to the rules, so that a motion to re-consider a section that had passed, should not be in order, unless made within three days after its passage.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, being the section, in relation to the term of service of clerks, sheriffs, county treasurers, auditors, &c. The pending question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Hancock to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Allen, by striking out all after the words "provided hereafter," and inserting the following:

"That the present incumbents shall continue in the exercise of the duties of their respective offices until the said officers are superseded under the authority of the Constitution."

Mr. BORDEN. Will the Secretary read the modification of my amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Switzerland, which I accepted.

The Secretary read: "Provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the officers from serving out the terms for which they are elected."

Mr. DOBSON. It does seem to me that it is an inappropriate time to decide this question. I think the proper time for settling this, and all similar questions will be after we have agreed upon the schedule which is to be attached to the new Constitution. For this reason, I move that the amendments be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. LOCKHART. Will the motion carry all the amendments to the resolution if it prevail?

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result—yeas, 75; nays, 46—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mathis, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, and Mr. President—75.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Balingall, Beard, Bicknell, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Murray, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Steele, Terry, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—46.

So the amendments were laid upon the table.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to amend by striking out the resolution and inserting a provision to the following effect:

"That all county officers shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective counties, at the time and places of holding the general election, and that they shall continue in office for a period not exceeding four years; provided, that no person shall be eligible more than two out of any three terms."

Mr. BRIGHT. I will submit one or two reasons why I have proposed this amendment. I think it inexpedient that we should, in the Constitution, designate any number of officers without assigning to them their appropriate duties.

The design of the committee, I doubt not, in framing this section was more to provide how county officers should be elected, and how long they should serve, than what should be the number of county officers. If that was the design, as I suppose it to have been, then the amendment I propose covers the whole ground; because, it provides as the section does, that all county officers shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county, and shall serve, as this resolution proposes that they shall serve, for a period not exceeding four years. The section, however, as it now stands, provides that there shall be elected a long list of county officers, some of whom were unknown to the old Constitution—some of whom were unknown even to the statutes of the State, until within the last few years. That is particularly the fact with regard to the county auditor. By this section, as it stands, it is provided that there shall be elected certain county officers—and for what? We elect a clerk, a sheriff, a recorder, a county surveyor, &c.,—and for what? We assign to these officers, by this Constitution, no duties whatever. Now when we create an officer, by Constitutional provision, it seems to me that we ought to assign to him some duty. There is no necessity for creating officers by the Constitution, unless we do so. In the old Constitution it is provided that there shall be a Governor elected—and for what? Why we assign to him certain duties which he is required to perform. He is to see to the execution of all laws; convene the Legislature; remit fines and forfeitures; and to perform various other duties. It is provided also that a Lieutenant Governor shall be elected, and his duties are also prescribed. It is right and proper that where there is a specific duty to be performed, we should provide an officer to perform it. But in the case where no duty is to be performed why say anything about it? It seems to me we ought merely to declare in general terms that all county officers shall be elected, leaving to the Legislature to say what officers there shall be in the county. But here it is proposed that we shall specify what officers shall be elected. The time may come when some of them may be unnecessary. For instance, we provide that there shall be a county treasurer, and a county auditor. These offices have grown out of our new system of revenue within a few years past. Who can tell but that a new system may be adopted within the next ten years by which these offices may be rendered unnecessary; yet if you provide here, that such officers shall be elected, then we must continue to elect them whether we want them or not. The better way, it appears to me, would be to provide that all county officers shall be elected, as my amendment proposes, by the qualified electors of the county, to serve for a period of not more than four years. This will carry out what I believe were the views of the committee.

Mr. BORDEN. I entirely disagree with the gentleman from Jefferson. I supposed that one of the objects, and perhaps, the chief object, which the people had in view in calling this Convention, was to give some stability to the administration of State affairs. What do we see now? A proposition is offered which leaves to the Legislature to direct what county officers there shall be elected, and what their respective duties shall be. It seems to me that the duties of the officers should be specifically enumerated in the Constitution, so that the matter may be placed beyond the action of the Legislature. Why, it is a common thing, if a man falls out with a county officer, to come here and legislate him out of office; that is to legislate in such a way as to force him to resign. There are certain officers required to perform the business of the county, and they should be provided for, and put beyond the control of the Legislature. But gentlemen say that the officers should be elected for four years. Now I do not understand that the people desire them to be elected for four years. But the gentleman objects because we do not set out their duties. Surely the gentleman is not serious, when he says that we should prescribe the duties of these officers. By turning to the Constitution it will be seen, in section five, that it is provided, that there shall be elected a sheriff and a coroner. By referring to another part of the Constitution, we find it is provided that there shall be elected a clerk and a recorder, naming those officers. We have the precedent therefore, in the old Constitution, and these officers will probably be always required. I see no reason, therefore, why we should not state the officers and the period of service. I think the committee have done right in making the report they have, and that that report, ought to be adhered to.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. There is a great deal of force, it seems to me, in the remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson. In regard to these little offices, the committee have followed the dictum of the old Constitution; they have taken the officers that are provided for, in the old Constitution. With the committee the opinion predominated, that they ought to be made constitutional officers. But I concede that there is a great deal of force and propriety in the remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson. I agree with him entirely in the view which he takes.

Mr. BASCOM. In order to perfect the original amendment, I move to insert after the word "treasurer," the words "two associate judges," and after the word "recorder," the words "and associate judges."

Mr. BUTLER. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. BASCOM. I have the floor, I believe.
The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Wells is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BASCOM. Whether these officers shall be made Constitutional officers or not is to me a matter of indifference. But in accordance with the wishes of those whom I represent, I desire that they shall be provided for in the Constitution. They are not in favor of the one man power, in regard to appointments.

That is the reason why I offer this amendment. I shall not detain the Convention with any remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. I now move to lay the amendment upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson,

Mr. BRIGHT. If no other gentleman desires to speak upon this question, I wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Allen. In drawing up the amendment, I used the very language of the section as reported by the committee, with the exception that I have not prescribed the number of county officers, intending to conform as strictly as possible to the views of the committee in regard to the mode of election of county officers, and to their tenure of office. The amendment is objected to on the ground that unless the officers are named in the Constitution, there will be danger of a want of uniformity. The same difficulty exists now—the same irregularity exists. We have an officer that is named in the Constitution in some counties and not in others.

Now that is a feature that has been provided for by another committee—the committee on the uniformity of the laws, and if the section which they have reported be adopted, it will be impossible to have in one county, officers different from those of another. Then in regard to this amendment, the time may come when we shall require different county officers from those which we now have. Those officers have been named which are known to the Constitution and laws as they exist. But the time may come, when we shall want other officers, whose duties will have to be prescribed by statute, and if this section be adopted as it stands, we shall be prohibited from having other officers than those we now have.

There is one officer that I think we ought to dispense with—I mean the coroner. Yet that is a matter that I would leave to the Legislature. I would not provide that this officer shall be elected by the people whether they want him or not; nor would I provide that we shall, at all events, elect the other officers that are named in this section, when there may be nothing for them to do. The duties of all these officers are to be prescribed by statute, and the same statute may just as well designate the officers. There is no necessity for naming them in the Constitution, and it would be much the better and safer course not to do it.

Mr. WOLFE. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson will prevail. I do not think the Convention with all the wisdom that it possesses, can foresee all the changes that may necessarily take place hereafter. It is a matter that should be left to be regulated by the people through their representatives, and should not be made a Constitutional provision, unalterable for all time to come. The proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson seems to me to be so reasonable that I shall give it my cordial support.

Mr. KELSO. It seems to me that there is no officer here named, that is not absolutely necessary. The gentleman from Jefferson is sadly mistaken, when he tells us that in the old Constitution, the duties of these officers are not designated.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman mistakes me. I did not say that there are officers named in the Constitution, whose duties are not prescribed. I admit that there are, and it is proper that they should be prescribed. It is not worth while to name officers unless we prescribe their duties.

Mr. KELSO. Well, sir, it seems to me that it is proper to have the officers designated without going into detail respecting their duties. That is the business of the Legislature. It seems to me that there can be no two opinions about this matter. The gentleman thinks that we can dispense with the coroner. I would ask him, who will arrest the sheriff when it becomes necessary that he should be arrested? For that simple duty alone—that it may be performed by some proper authority—this office ought still to exist as it has existed time out of mind.

The recorder we might possibly be able to do without. The next question is as to the county auditor. There must be some one to do the business of the county. It is true that in some counties the duty of recorder and auditor might be performed by the clerk of the county; but as the intention is to have uniformity—to have the same offices in all the counties—why not name them?

I can see no impropriety in designating these officers, and it seems to me that every one must be satisfied that all the officers named in this section are necessary. I do not wish to make a motion that will stifle debate, but when gentlemen have debated it as long as they wish to do, I will move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. SMITH of Scott moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "treasurer," the word "assessor."

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I will state that the committee, in forming this section, thought they were carrying out the design of the Convention. These officers were named in order to put the county organization beyond the reach of unnecessary amendments by the Legislature. The objection made by the gentleman from Jefferson was canvassed by the committee. It was foreseen that circumstances might arise in which some of these officers might be unnecessary, and therefore the committee limited the specification of officers to such number as would necessarily be permanent county officers, and they named them for the purpose of giving permanency to the organization of counties. The committee were of opinion that these officers would continue to be necessary under any organization similar to our present one, and there is a provision for other officers, if necessary, in future; and unless gentlemen say that some of these officers are unnecessary, there is a propriety, as it appears to me, in specifying them.

Mr. BORDEN. One word in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Scott. I hope it will not prevail. I find that many counties have adopted the system of choosing a treasurer in each township. I know that there is, especially in the northern portion of the State, a general desire to transact business by townships. It is the old New England mode, and one that has heretofore been considered the best mode that could be pursued. I hope that the amendment will not prevail, and the question be left open for the Legislature to direct whether there shall be a country assessor or not.

In regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, it seems to me that the committee in their report have provided in the best way for this matter. By turning to section five it will be seen that it is provided that such other officers as may be necessary shall be appointed in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. When that section comes up I shall move to change the phraseology so as to direct that they shall be elected.

As to the objections of the gentleman that some of the offices may hereafter be unnecessary, it appears to me that the gentleman from Switzerland is correct when he says that we shall always require them. The gentleman says that the coroner may be dispensed with. I will suggest to him that there may be occasions when it may be necessary to take the sheriff into custody, and the coroner is the only officer by whom this duty can be performed. I do not think there is a single officer named that is not necessary, and I repeat that I think this Convention ought to regulate this matter by Constitutional provision, and put it out of the power of the Legislature to legislate men out of office. Why, you may begin at Posey and go to Steuben county, and you will find that every county has a different system. This, I think, should be changed so as to have uniformity.

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Scott on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson;

Mr. KELSO moved that it be laid upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 82, nays 34—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Hawkins, Holman, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chenoweth, Cookerly, Dick, Farrow, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, March, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mower, Nave, Ristine, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Watts, Wolfe, and Yocum—34.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. SIMS. I move to amend the section by inserting in the ninth line, after the word "qualified," the words "whose several duties shall be prescribed," so that that clause of the section will read:

"The Sheriff, Coroner, and Treasurer shall each continue in office two years, and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified, whose several duties shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. BORDEN. It does not appear to me that this amendment is very material. It is a mere verbal amendment, and the committee on arrangements and phraseology will attend to all these verbal amendments.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELSO. I have an amendment to offer to the first section, which I will endeavor to explain in very few words. As the section now reads, it provides that the several officers therein named shall be elected by the qualified electors of the several counties, at the time and places of holding elections for members of the General Assembly. Now, if we should adopt a provision in the Constitution restricting the Legislature to biennial sessions, we might, as the section now stands, create a difficulty which it would not be easy to remedy. I move, therefore, to amend the section by inserting the word "general" before the word "elections," and by striking out the words "members of the General Assembly," so as to make the section read:

"That the several officers therein named shall be elected at the time and places of holding general elections."

Mr. HOVEY. I wish to say, once for all, that I am opposed to this and all other sections which limits the right of the people to elect any man as often as they think proper. As the voice of this Convention, however, is decidedly fixed upon the restrictive policy, I shall offer no factious opposition to this or any other section on that account, and shall therefore vote for the section.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KELSO, it was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. I have an amendment to offer to the section, which is to strike out the word "auditor," where it occurs in the fourth, sixth, and seventh lines, and insert the word "auditors" in the eighth and tenth lines. As this section was reported by the committee, it provides that the county auditor shall hold office for the term of four years. I think this is wrong. We have already passed a provision deciding that the Auditor of State shall hold office for only two years; and I think the same restriction ought to be applied to county auditors, so as to make the offices uniform.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. A single word in regard to this amendment. It will be remembered, that, in the cases of the State Auditor and State Treasurer, we fixed the term of holding office in such a manner as to make the Auditor a check upon the Treasurer. The same object was contemplated by the committee which reported this section; and if this amendment is adopted, that object cannot be effected, inasmuch as the terms of holding office will be equal.

Mr. WORK. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to suggest a mere verbal alteration in the section, the propriety of which, I think, will be apparent to every gentleman at once. The "clerk" mentioned in the section is styled "a Clerk of the Circuit Court." But we have not yet determined what the name of the court will be. It may be that it will be denominated "District Court," or by some other name. In order, therefore, to avoid any difficulty, I think it would be better that he should be styled "county clerk." It seems to me that that name would be more appropriate; but I leave it with the Convention.

After some conversation, the amendment was withdrawn.

The section was further amended by inserting the words "and surveyor" in the third and eighth lines; and there being no other amendments, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPOINTMENT OF COUNTY CLERK, pro tem.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the second section, which provides that when the office of Clerk of the Circuit Court of any county shall become vacant, the Circuit Court of such county, or the Judge thereof, shall appoint a clerk pro tempore, who shall hold his office until the next general election.

Mr. WOLFE. I move to amend this section by striking out the words "Circuit Court of such county, or the Judge thereof," and inserting "board of county commissioners." [Cries of "No! no!"]

There are a great many noes to this proposition; but I think, directly, when I have explained the object of my amendment, some of these "noes" will be turned into "ayes." [A laugh.] Sometimes gentlemen shout "no" to a proposition before they understand what the nature of it is. Now the Judge of a Circuit Court will, in many cases, perhaps in most, have a range of some eight or ten counties; and we all know well enough how this thing goes. A man wants the office of clerk of the county, and he gets up a recommendation from a few individuals known to the Judge of the Circuit Court, and by this means obtains the appointment. One main object, I believe, in revising the Constitution was, to fix it so that all officers should be elected by the people. The county commissioners are directly elected from the people in their several counties; but the Judges of the Circuit Courts are not; and it must necessarily follow that the county commissioners will be better judges of the qualifications of a man for the office of clerk in their county than the Judge of a Circuit Court can be, because he cannot have a residence in all the counties of his circuit. Besides, I go for the principle, in all cases, of vesting the power as near home as may be—that is in the people; and therefore I hope the Convention will adopt the amendment I have offered. If, however, there be much opposition to it, I shall certainly demand the yeas and nays; because I want to see who wants to get furthest from the people, and who nearest to them.

Mr. KELSO. A word in reply to the gentleman from Sullivan. As to the observation of the gentleman in reference to giving the power of appointment to a Judge of a Circuit Court, taking the power further from the people, it is all a mistake, especially if we provide that the Judges themselves shall be elected by the people. ["Consent! consent!"]

Mr. WOLFE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him one moment for an explanation?

Mr. KELSO. Oh, certainly.

Mr. WOLFE. It is all true enough that the judges may be elected by the people; and yet it is quite possible that a judge, having the power of appointing a clerk in any given county, might not have received one vote in that county.

Mr. KELSO. That may be all so, but does not, in my view, materially alter the position of affairs. I want to know if the gentleman from Sullivan thinks that that officer (the Judge of the Circuit Court) is only to be held responsible to those who vote for him? If that is the notion which the gentleman from Sullivan entertains, I say it is bad democracy.

Now permit me to say one word as to who is most competent to judge of the qualifications of the officer required to fill this post—the board of commissioners or the Judge of the Circuit Court, in which most of the duties appertaining to this office are to be performed. I can only say, that, unless you have very different men in your counties, as commissioners, to some that I am acquainted with, I am free to give it as my opinion, that the judge of any court, a thousand miles away, would be better able to judge of the qualifications of a clerk to serve in his court, than would a board of commissioners. He need not have more than five minutes, conversation with a man to know whether he is qualified or not; or, indeed, to know more about his qualifications for such a situation, than a board of commissioners would know from an acquaintance with him for a year.

Mr. WOLFE (interposing). But I understand by the next section that the candidate for the clerkship is to have a certificate of his qualifications from one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, or one of the Judges of the Circuit Courts.

Mr. KELSO. The gentleman from Sullivan had better not count his chickens before they are hatched, because the next section has not passed yet [laughter], and he can therefore understand nothing from that. But supposing that section was passed in the form in which it is reported, it would be just as vain to expect that any real value would accrue from the certificate as to attempt to make a whistle out of a pig's tail. [Great laughter.]

A VOICE. Especially if the pig had no tail. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. KELSO. The gentleman said the county commissioners would be the best judges of the qualifications of the applicant for the office of county clerk. Now if that is so, let me ask him where is the necessity for his having a certificate of his qualifications, either from a judge of the supreme court or a judge of the circuit courts. They are to judge of his qualifications and give him a certificate; and when they have given their verdict that he is so qualified, then, with their certificate in his hands, he is to go before the board of county commissioners, who are to be the "best judges of his qualifications." Does not every gentleman see the absurdity of the thing? What necessity for a certificate if the county commissioners are the "best judges of the qualifications of the applicant?"

I maintain, Mr. President, that the appointing power is placed in the right hands when it is placed in the hands of the judge of the court in which the clerk is to render the services. I think it must be obvious to every man that if he is at all competent to preside over a court, as judge, he must be still more competent to judge of the qualifications of the man who is to be his clerk. He will, at all events, be, in my opinion, a better judge of the matter than the county commissioners. I think, therefore, we had better leave the appointing power in those hands in which it has been ever since the formation of the State, without any serious inconvenience having been experienced.

Mr. READ of Clark. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, by striking out the words "board of county commissioners," and inserting "board doing county business."

Mr. WOLFE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. BORDEN. I think, Mr. President, that there is a very important principle involved in this matter. I hold that men who are appointed to be your judges should not have any influences operating upon them in regard to appointments to office in any shape. We are, I believe, about to adopt a provision in our Constitution that the judges of the several courts shall hereafter be elected by the people. It is thought by many that in these elections politics will never be brought into the controversy, but that a strict regard to legal qualifications and unsullied integrity will be the main considerations in the qualifications of the candidates.

But, sir, there is another reason why I think we should take from the judges the appointing power, and, as I imagine, a much stronger one than that I have just recited, and that is, that every officer who has a public duty to perform should be elected by the people, where it can be so done. And, as the gentleman from Sullivan has said, the county commissioners must, in the main, be better judges of the qualifications of a man residing in their county than a judge of a circuit court who does not reside in the county. Now look at the State of Ohio. In many instances the county clerk completely rides over the people. He knows he is not elected by them, but appointed by the judge; and in many instances when information is wanted by citizens, which it is his duty to impart, he will pay no attention to them, or perhaps even go so far as to give them an uncivil answer. There is no office that I know of which more imperatively requires that the incumbent should be elected by the people than this, and I hope that we shall have a county board in each county elected by the people, whose duty, among others, it shall be to judge of the qualifications of these clerks. I trust that the principle embodied in the resolution of the gentleman from Sullivan will prevail, and that this appointment will be given to that board.

In one point I do not agree with my friend from Sullivan, and that is in regard to the "certificate." I think if anything in this world is a humbug it is this thing of certificates. It simply amounts to this: if you are a judge of the supreme, or one of the circuit courts, some man to whom you are known writes to you stating that a friend of his wants to be a candidate for the office of county clerk; that he is a good, clever fellow, and well qualified to fill such an office. You do not know anything about the man yourself, and what judge, among the vast amount of other business which he may have on his hands, is going to sit down and closely investigate a matter of this sort? If he has the testimony of a friend that the candidate is a pretty fair man, that is generally enough for him, and out of courtesy to his personal friend he will not withhold the certificate. Under all these circumstances, then, I take it for granted that if you have a county board in each of your counties, consisting of three or of five members, they will be the best able to judge of the qualifications of the applicants for this office, and I think in their hands, perhaps, the election ought to rest.

Mr. WOLFE. I am not going to detain the Convention with any remarks on this subject. I will merely say that I will take back all that part of my argument which relates to the certificate, because my friend from Allen (Mr. Borden) is a judge, and knows exactly how the thing is done. [Laughter.]

But I would remark, in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland, that under the old Constitution we have associate judges, and I believe that there is a disposition in this Convention to dispense with them. They had this appointment, and have it yet; and if we dispense with associate judges, unless this appointment is made by a board of commissioners, or a "county board," as the amendment now is, it will have to be made by the circuit judge.

Mr. KELSO. I desire to say one word in reference to what has fallen from my friend from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) who appears to be alarmed about the appointment of a clerk pro tempore, when a vacancy may occur. It is less than a year that that officer will serve when thus appointed; and I think it is not much likely to affect either the integrity of a judge on the bench or the people of the State generally, that such pro tempore appointment should be vested in the judge of the court.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Wolfe as amended by Mr. Read of Clark, and a division being called for, there were ayes 49, noes 46.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It occurs to me that this section ought to be stricken out and a general provision reported which will answer the purpose. Indeed I believe there is such a provision reported in another article, and I think this article would look better without the section.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move to postpone the section indefinitely.

Mr. HARDIN. I move to lay the section upon the table.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the section on the table, there were for the motion ayes 46, noes 47.

So the motion to lay the section upon the table did not prevail.

The question then recurred on the motion to indefinitely postpone the section, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 56, noes 40.

CERTIFICATE OF CLERK OF CIRCUIT COURT.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section No. 3.

The section provides that no person shall be eligible to the office of Clerk of the Circuit Court, unless he has first obtained from one or more of the judges of the Supreme or Circuit Court, a certificate that he is qualified to execute the duties of the office.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. I move to lay that section upon the table. It is a mere addition to the last section, the consideration of which has been indefinitely postponed.

The motion to lay the section upon the table was agreed to.

ELECTION OF JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section four of the article.

The section provides that a competent number of justices of the peace shall be elected in each township of the several counties, who shall continue in office four years, if they so long behave well, and whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. WATTS. I move to strike out the word "competent," in the first line. [Laughter].

After some conversation, the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) was withdrawn.

Mr. BORDEN. One word in regard to this section. It struck me that, as justices of the peace have to do with the administration of the laws, this section ought to have been reported—or some section on the subject—by the Committee on the organization of courts of justice, and not by the committee on county and township organization. However, as it is here, I do not know but we may as well dispose of it now. I have an amendment to propose to the section, which is that justices of the peace should be elected for three years, and that there should be three in each township; and that they should be so classified by law, as that one should go out every third year, and another be elected in his place. There ought, I think, to be not less than three in each township, let it be ever so small. If the township be large, it is certainly important that there should not be less than that number, and I think that that number, too, would be sufficient to do all the business. I hear it said by some gentleman that this will conflict with biennial elections. I would observe, with regard to that, that the amendment provides that the election of justices of the peace shall take place only at the time of holding township elections, so that it does not conflict at all with the other elections.

[The amendment was then read by the Clerk—the substance is given above].

Mr. SHOUP. As the office of a justice of the peace is a very important one, and as we ought to have time to consider the effect of this amendment, I move to lay it upon the table.

The motion to lay the amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend, by striking out the word "four," in the third line, and inserting the word "three," so as to make the term of office of a justice of the peace three years.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the section, by striking out the words "a competent number of," in the first line, so as to make the section read, "justices of the peace shall be elected," &c.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 35, noes 50.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

There being no other amendments, the question was on engrossing the section for a third reading, which was decided in the affirmative.

FURTHER REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON COUNTY AND TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business before the Convention is bill No. 6.

APPOINTMENTS NOT PROVIDED FOR.

This is a continuation of the report from the committee on county and township organization. The fifth section of the report provides that such other county and township officers as may be necessary, shall be appointed in such manner as may be appointed by law.

Mr. BORDEN. By turning to the section, it will be seen, as I observed this morning, that the word "appointed" has reference to the appointing power vested in the judges, or Governor, or Lieutenant Governor. Now, it occurs to me that the words "elected or" ought to be inserted so as to make it read, "elected" or appointed.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. That idea was suggested to the Committee when this section was under their consideration, and it was not supposed by the committee that officers would be appointed in any other way than by election. It was held by the committee that an election was an appointment."

Mr. BORDEN. That may be true in one sense; but in the ordinary and common usage of the words, "appointing" is not "electing."

Mr. KELSO. I have heard of a case in which a clerk of a circuit court was "appointed," and it was contended that he was "elected."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Borden, it was agreed to by consent, and the section was then, by consent, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

VACANCIES IN OFFICE NOT PROVIDED FOR.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section No. 6.

This section provides that vacancies in office in this article, not herein provided for, shall be filled in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

Mr. CHAPMAN. There are no vacancies in office mentioned in this article that are provided for, and therefore the words "not provided for" are superfluous, and ought to be stricken out. I move that these words be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATTS. I move further to amend the section, by striking out the words "in this article." Then it will read "vacancies in office shall be filled in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

[Cries of "No, no, no."]

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I presume the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) might find cases in which his amendment would not be suitable, as, for instance, in the death of a Governor; and therefore, I think we had better retain the words "in this article."

Mr. WATTS withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. Is there any amendment pending, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. CLARK. Then I will move to amend the section in the first line, by inserting after the word "in," the words "county and township." It will then read "vacancies in county and township offices," &c. I will move also to strike out the words "in this article."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that these words are already stricken out. [Several voices, "No no."]

Mr. CLARK. I will explain this, if the Convention will give me its attention for a moment.

If the section is worded as I propose to amend it, it will then read, "Vacancies in county and township offices shall be filled in such manner as may be prescribed by law." That, I believe, is all that is meant by the section, and it is in that way clearly expressed. ["Consent, consent."]

The amendment was agreed to, and the section being read as amended, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPOINTMENTS PRO TEMPORE.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section No. 7.

The section provides that no person shall be rendered ineligible to any office, created by that article, by reason of his appointment pro tempore to such office.

This section was ordered to a third reading by consent.

RESIDENCE OF COUNTY AND TOWNSHIP OFFICERS.

The next section considered by the Convention was No. 8, providing that county and township officers should reside within their respective counties and townships, and keep their offices at such places therein as may be directed by law.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "therein," in the third line, the words "perform such duties."

Mr. MORRISON would suggest to the gentleman from Marion whether those words were not already in another section, and applicable to the same officers. He thought the amendment was tautological.

The amendment was adopted—ayes 47, noes not counted; and the section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by consent.

BILL NO. 7—QUALIFICATIONS OF COUNTY OFFICERS.

The Convention next took up bill No. 7, containing four additional sections to those already reported on the subject of county and township officers. Section 9 provides that no person shall be elected or appointed an officer within any county who shall not have been a citizen and an inhabitant therein one year next preceding his appointment, if the county shall have been so long erected; but if the county shall not have been so long erected, then within the limits of the county or counties out of which the same shall have been taken.

Mr. WALPOLE. I move to amend the section by striking out the word "citizen" in the second line, and after the word "inhabitant," in the same line, insert the words, "and a qualified elector therein." My object in proposing this amendment, is this: the word "citizen" carries with it the implication of citizen of the United States. Now a person may be an inhabitant of the State and a qualified elector to a certain extent, and yet by a construction of that word "citizen" in this 9th section, he could not enjoy the privilege of holding office, although he is by a section reported by the committee on elective franchise, declared capable of voting for township officers in the township in which he resides. With the permission of the Convention, I will read the section to which I refer. It is the first section in Report No. 13.

[Mr. W. read the section.]

My object is to confer the right of holding township offices upon all electors; and I entertain the idea that if the word "citizen" is allowed to remain, it will exclude a large portion of the qualified electors of the State. If there is any difficulty about it, I will ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORDEN. Is it to strike out the word "citizen?"

Mr. WALPOLE. It is.

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that all the qualification necessary for holding an office is that a man should be an elector of that office. [Cries of "consent, consent."]

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALL moved to strike out the word "erected" where it occurs in the section, and insert the word "organized." He thought this was a much more appropriate word than the word "erected." ["Consent."]

The amendment was agreed to by consent, and the section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

IMPEACHMENT OF OFFICERS.

The Convention next proceeded to consider Section No. 10, which provides that all county and township officers may be impeached or removed from office in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

Mr. SIMS. I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "office" and inserting "by the circuit court of the proper county."

Mr. BORDEN. It occurs to me that the section is better as it stands. We have not decided that we shall have a circuit court yet; we may have a district court or a county court. As we are upon these county matters, I rose for the purpose of saying that no provision is made in this article for the appointment of an officer to an office which I apprehend will become an important one. I refer to that of Master Commissioner. If the Convention should determine to abolish the office of associate judge, the power to grant writs of habeas corpus and injunctions should be vested in this officer. Now, how shall we provide for that office?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Allen, that this is out of order. It has nothing to do with the section under consideration.

Mr. BORDEN. I thought we had some little latitude of debate—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Allen that the section under consideration relates to the impeachment and removal of officers—not the creation of new offices. The subject is out of order now, but that does not prevent the gentleman from talking about it hereafter.

Mr SMITH of Ripley. The committee on the organization of the courts of justice will have to provide for that identical thing.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Sims, it was rejected, and the amendment was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

UNIFORMITY IN COUNTY BUSINESS.

The Convention next took up section 11, providing that the General Assembly should provide by law for a uniform mode of doing county and township business.

No amendments were offered to this section, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by consent.

SIZE OF COUNTIES.

The twelfth section was next taken up. It provides that the General Assembly shall pass no law reducing any county to a less extent than four hundred square miles. When the section was read there were loud cries of "consent, consent," and "no, no."

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to amend the section so as to confer upon the General Assembly the power of changing the boundaries of counties whenever such change might be required for the promotion of the public good.

Mr. KELSO demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Chenoweth, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Hawkins, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, May, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Robinson, Sherrod, Sims, Smith of Scott, Spann, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, and Yocum—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, McConney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Watts, Wiley Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—75.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. HUFF moved, as a substitute for the section, that no county should be reduced to a less content than three hundred square miles, in the formation of a new county, nor to a less content than four hundred square miles without the consent of a majority of the citizens of the counties to be affected by the formation of such new county.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the amendment.

Mr. WATTS, That is a pretty plausible amendment on its face, yet under that amendment nearly every county in the State could be disorganized. I know of a few counties in the State of Indiana that have cost the State at least a hundred thousand dollars in litigating on this subject; Crawford, for one, and Dearborn, for another, and I do hope the Convention will put this matter at rest. This is the place to do it. This constant desire to change the boundaries of counties has kept them in a state of continual turmoil year after year, and has been made more a source of litigation and contention in the Legislature than any other subject, and as I have once before said, I do hope we will settle the question here. Four hundred square miles is not too large for a county. And I find, from my experience,—living twenty-three miles from a county seat—that the further a man is removed from the seat of litigation the better—the less inconvenience he has.

Mr. HAWKINS moved to amend the amendment by substituting the following:

"No county shall be reduced in population by a division of her territory below the representative ratio."

Mr. READ of Clarke moved to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

Mr. DUNN of Perry, &c. inquired of the Chair whether it was in order to move the previous question.

The CHAIR. It is not in order to do anything but to vote. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Brackne, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of H., Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hitt, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

NAVS—Messrs. Alexander, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Chandler, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Gootee, Hawkins, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, March, May, McFarland, Milligan, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Robinson, Shoup, Sims, Spann, Thornton, Trimby, and Walpole—29.

So the amendment and the amendment to the amendment were laid upon the table.

Mr. CARR. I move to amend the section by adding to the end of it, "Nor shall any new county hereafter created contain less than three hundred square miles."

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the amendment by adding: "Nor shall any county under four hundred square miles be reduced below its present area."

After some further consideration, Mr. HARDIN called for a division of the question.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table;

And the question being taken there were for the motion, ayes 70, noes not counted.

So the motion to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table, was agreed to.

Mr. HOVEY. I should like to have a word or two of explanation, so that I might understand what we are voting for.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman must get his understanding some other way. The question is on laying the amendment on the table.

The question being taken on laying the amendment on the table, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 55, noes not counted.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to amend by adding, "Nor shall any county of less extent be reduced in size."

Mr. HARDIN. Here is an amendment which is better in its phraseology than that.

The amendment of Mr. Hardin was being again read when,

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to offer again what has just been voted upon and rejected.

A MEMBER. He only wants it read for information.

The Clerk proceeded to read:

"Add to the end of the section, 'Nor shall any county—'"

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order; the Convention has just voted to lay it upon the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out the whole section, and I will say one or two words merely for the purpose of setting myself right.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Decatur has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know, Mr. President, that it only wants seven or eight minutes to twelve o'clock, but there is yet time enough for all I have to say. I remarked that in making the motion that I had made to strike out the section, I had made it more for the purpose of setting myself right than with any hope that it would be adopted, judging from the manifest determination of the Convention. Notwithstanding that, I believe that if the Convention will reflect for a moment, if they will permit a second sober thought to influence them, they will certainly come to the conclusion, at least so far as the rights of the people are concerned, that they are exercising an arbitrary power.

Now it seems to me, that if any question can present itself for the deliberation of the Convention which is a question which should be left for the people themselves to decide, it is this question. The gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) has correctly remarked, that that county, and perhaps some other counties, have cost the State, by legislation on this subject, a large amount of money. Well, sir, let me ask him, how did it cost a large amount of money? It was because the people, in their sovereign capacity, were determined to avail themselves of that provision guaranteed to them by the Constitution, of petitioning the Legislature for a redress of their grievances, and of enforcing their rights before the Legislature. And, sir, the county from which my highly respected friend comes, was at this time a scene of litigation I admit, and would have been so to this day if the grievances of that people had not been heard.

Now what do we attempt to do by this 11th section? We attempt to place in the mouth of the people, in their sovereign capacity, nothing more nor less than a "gag" law. We attempt to say to them by this arbitrary rule of Constitutional legislation that we here "take from you the rights that you possess as a sovereign people, of petitioning the Legislature for a redress of your grievances." It simply amounts to that. Adopt that 11th section providing that no county shall be reduced below 400 square miles, and although it does not actually prevent the people from sending their petitions to their immediate representatives, although it does not prevent them from calling upon the Legislature for a redress of their grievances, yet it takes from the Legislature the power to redress those grievances, and amounts at once to a prohibition in the organic law, that takes from the people a sacred right guaranteed to them by the bill of rights.

Sir, it is wrong in principle; it is wrong to place any such restriction in the organic law; it is a question which addresses itself directly to the rights of the people; it is one which may be safely left to the Legislature for future legislation. This has been an agitated question for some thirty or forty years, and the Legislature has always acted with caution, although scarcely a session has passed during that time without petitions being presented on the subject. But let me say that if you adopt this section, instead of redressing the grievances of many parts of the State, you will confirm and enforce those grievances; and I believe that no part of the State will have a greater right to complain than that portion of the people whom I represent on this floor, and whose petitions I have presented to this Convention. That petition, together with the diagram that accompanied it, showed that the people were grieved; that there was a territory sufficiently large to form a new county. Now if that people should petition the Legislature, and that Legislature under that peculiar state of facts, see fit to grant the prayer of their petition, and enact laws for the relief of the petitioners, let me ask gentlemen to say who is injured by it! Where is the mischief? Is the old county injured? Have we a right to say that we will compel men against their interest and convenience, to remain in an old county purely because we want to levy upon them a certain amount of tax? Sir, such a proposition, in my estimation, is perfectly monstrous. The old county has the benefit of the public buildings which have been erected by the aid and assistance of those who desire to form a new county. That much they receive as a gratuity. If, then, that section of the State which I represent, or other sections of the State, no matter where, see cause to organize new counties and erect new public buildings and bear the burden themselves, I would like gentlemen to say upon what principle of right, or justice, or equity, we should stand here and deny to them that privilege? Shall we undertake to deny to the people the right to enjoy life and liberty, and to acquire property in that way which is most conducive to their happiness? Pass this section, adopt it as a part of your organic law, and you will virtually deprive the people of one of their most sacred rights. This Convention has been sent here for the purpose of guarding the rights of the people; for the purpose of framing an organic law by which these rights shall be more effectually secured. But if you pass this section I hesitate not to say that you will have one provision in your organic law by which you forever preclude them from the enjoyment of a sacred privilege—by which you tell them that, be their situation in after times what it may, they shall yield to the will of this Convention. And on what ground is this to be done? Merely because counties already erected do not wish to part with their taxables. I appeal to the Convention to say if this is an act of justice? I ask this Convention to consider whether, in passing such a section as this, you are securing the rights of the people, or narrowing and restricting those rights?

Sir, I have heard no gentlemen say on this floor, that he votes for this section on any other ground than that of expediency—the mere contemptible question of dollars and cents. Sir, when the right of the people to enjoy liberty and equality is at stake, I do not stop to inquire into the paltry consideration of dollars and cents. I only stop to ask the question, “Is it right? is it justice to require it? are the people capable of self-government? have they a right to manage their own domestic concerns?” And if a question of that kind presents itself to me, I leave that question with them. It is safely left in their hands.

I hope the Convention will reflect upon this subject. I hope they will come to a wise conclusion. And the only conclusion to which they can come as rational men is, that they are voting upon a question of mere expediency; and if that section is adopted, by that vote which adopts it they are taking away from the people an inherent right, guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the bill of rights under which we live. We should pause and hesitate before we do it; we should leave the question as one that belongs to the people and to their representatives in the Legislature, and let them manage it. And if we so leave it I have no fear but that it will be managed in such a way as will give general satisfaction to all the parties concerned. I do hope then that this matter will not be acted upon hastily; that the Convention will consider well what they are doing; that they will strike this section out and leave the matter to the people and the Legislature, to whom the question properly belongs.

Mr. BROOKBANK. My heart responds most cordially to most of what has fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Decatur; and as I hold in my hand an amendment to the original section, which I think will greatly improve it if adopted, and as the hour has now arrived at which the Convention usually adjourns, I will move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Pending the question on the motion of the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) to strike out the section—

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT resumed the Chair at two o'clock.

Mr. HALL rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. BROOKBANK. Mr. PRESIDENT, I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALL. I was going to ask for a suspension of the rules, to enable me to present a motion to amend the rules, for the purpose of avoiding an error into which the Convention fell this morning. But, as the motion would require some explanation, I yield the floor.

Mr. BROOKBANK. The proposition under consideration at the time of adjournment, was in relation to the organization of counties.

I propose to amend this section by adding the following, viz.

“Provided, That no county shall contain over four hundred square miles, and the excess arising from such adjustment shall attach to the adjacent smaller counties, if such there be.”

Now, Mr. President, my feeble capacity as a speaker and the embarrassment and diffidence under which I labor in presenting my views to a deliberative body, will no doubt prevent me from doing the subject that justice which its merits demand.

The proposition which I have made, does not necessarily produce any of those dreaded consequences referred to by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts), as it need not in any case be a subject of litigation.

It simply provides, that the provision shall apply to those counties, having an excess of territory above four hundred square miles, which are contiguous to counties of a less area than such amount.

This, Mr. President, in my opinion would tend to equalize and harmonize the interests and policy of many portions of the State, where there is now a great diversity.

It has long been an established principle, and settled conviction in my mind, that the more nearly we can approximate to uniformity in the size of our counties, the more satisfactory will be the civil administration of the government.

In many counties, in consequence of their great size, the taxes are comparatively very light, and the people are able to prosecute works of internal improvement with a great deal of ease, in comparison with those residing in counties of less territory.

This inequality in the burdens imposed upon the people of the various counties, as well as their different degrees of prosperity as bodies politic, I think, sir, in a great measure, results from the present disparity in the size of the counties. The amendment which I have offered, would tend to destroy this inequality, and relieve the hardships of the people of the smaller counties, without doing any injustice to those of the larger ones.

I hope gentlemen will view the proposition dispassionately, and give due consideration to this matter, before passing sentence upon it.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the adoption of the gentlemen from Union.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. Would it be now in order to offer an amendment by way of substitute for the original section.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly. The present amendment is to add to the section.

Mr. DUNN. Then I offer the following, and demand the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

Strike out the section and insert—

“No old county shall be reduced, for the purpose of forming a new county, below four hundred square miles, unless by a distinct vote of a clear majority of the legal votes of said county, to be taken at a general election in favor of said reduction.”

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were taken upon the adoption of this amendment, and the Secretary reported—yeas 29, nays 73—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beach, Blythe, Borden, Bright, Cookerly, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Gootee, Gordon, Hawkins, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Lockhart, March, Milligan, Mowrer, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ristine, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Trimby, Yocum—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Moonney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Prather, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Worke, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—73.

So the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. Brookbank.

Mr. HOVEY. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word “provided,” and inserting in lieu thereof the following words:

“Nor shall any county under four hundred square miles, be reduced below its present area, without the consent of a majority of the legal voters thereof.”

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Posey is well drawn. I am in favor of it all except that part which proposes to submit the question of reduction to the legal voters. I move to strike out the words, “without the consent of the legal voters thereof.”

Mr. HOVEY said: I accept the modification. It will be seen by examining the section under discussion, that the construction of that section would prohibit any county, exceeding four hundred square miles, from being reduced below that area. That section as reported would leave all the counties in the State under four hundred square miles, liable to be divided without regard to their size. I have been in favor of leaving this question to the people, but as the action of this Convention plainly indicates that no county exceeding four hundred square miles, is to be reduced below that size, I think it no more than right, that the smaller counties should be governed by like principles. The amendment I have offered will have the effect to perfect the meaning of the section and guard the smaller counties from being torn in pieces.

Mr. Hovey's amendment was agreed to; and the question recurred upon ordering the section as amended, to be engrossed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe I have already moved to amend, by striking out the entire section.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman has made such a motion, the Chair is not aware of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Chair is not informed of the fact, I will now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I demand the previous question,

And the call being seconded by the Convention, the main question was ordered to be now put.

The PRESIDENT. The first question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Decatur; and then the question will be upon the engrossment.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment which I have presented involves the isolated question, whether the people shall govern themselves—

Cries of "order"—"order."

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Decatur will take his seat.

Mr. ROBINSON (in his seat). I have a right to call for the yeas and nays, and that is what I got up for.

The yeas and nays being ordered and taken upon Mr. Robinson's motion, the vote was reported—yeas 28, nays 80—and recorded as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Cookerly, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Gootee, Hawkins, Holman, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, Milligan, Mower, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Robinson, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Spann, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, and Yocum—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—80.

So the proposition was rejected, and the question recurred upon the engrossment.

This question was decided in the affirmative.

So the section, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and receive a third reading on to-morrow.

THE TREASURY.

The PRESIDENT said, the next thing in the orders of the day, is the consideration of the report submitted by the chairman of the committee on finance and taxation, on the 29th of October, consisting of two sections.

The question being upon ordering the same to be engrossed and read a third time—Is it the pleasure of the Convention to consider them together, or separately?

SEVERAL VOICES. "Separately."

The Secretary was directed to read the first section, and it is as follows:

"SEC. —. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Mr. KENT proposed to amend this section, by striking out the words "in consequence," and inserting the words "by virtue."

This amendment was rejected.

The question recurring upon the engrossment of the section, it was decided in the affirmative, without a division.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT announced the consideration of the second section of the report; and it was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"SEC. —. An accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of the public money shall be attached to and published with the laws of each regular session of the General Assembly."

The question being, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?—

Mr. WOLFE. I propose to amend the section so that it will read as follows:

"An accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of the public money, or loans authorized by the Legislature, shall be attached to, and published with, the laws of each session of the General Assembly."

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I propose to amend the section by adding the following:

"And the Auditor and Treasurer of State shall make full reports annually, of the finances and revenues of the State, to the Governor, who shall, without delay, publish the same for the information of the people."

Mr. BORDEN. Inasmuch as the Legislature is to meet but once in two years, I cannot see how this information can be annually obtained from the Auditor and Treasurer, without a provision of this kind. I believe that in other States, where they have adopted biennial sessions of the General Assembly, similar provisions have been inserted in their Constitutions.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRISON'S amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. WOLFE. I move to amend by striking out the word "regular." If we should have a called session of the General Assembly, we would have as much need of these reports as we have at any regular session.

This amendment was adopted, upon a division—in the affirmative, 40; in the negative, 38.

And then the section, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on to-morrow.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Is it in order now to introduce a section here, in relation to the subject of taxation?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that it is not in order to introduce a section at this time.

Mr. BORDEN. It is important that this question should be settled——

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Allen, that there is no question now before the Convention to be settled.

The next thing in order, in the orders of the day, is the consideration of the report submitted by the chairman of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, on the 31st day of October.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Do I understand the President to decide that it is not in order to add an additional section to the article?

The PRESIDENT. Not now because the article has been disposed of.

Mr. BORDEN. It appears, then, that the moment the Convention agrees to consider a report by sections, that moment the opportunity for amendment, by introducing a new section, is gone from us.——

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. BORDEN. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT. Then the gentleman has nothing to hang a speech upon.

Mr. BORDEN. I propose, then, that we take up the report, and consider it as a whole; [cries of "no"—"no,"] and go on and accept or reject it as a whole. Otherwise there will be no adequate opportunity for making amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has not decided that an amendment could not have been offered to the report, the last section of which has been just ordered to be engrossed. The Chair has decided this: that, after the Convention has ordered a section to be engrossed and read a third time, it has passed from before the Convention, and that it is not then in a condition to be amended on the same day.

Mr. BORDEN. What I meant to say, was, that we do not want to amend the section—we desire to amend the report by an additional section. We want to say in that report, for instance, that the taxes shall be uniform and equal throughout the State; but, if we want to introduce a new section to this effect, we cannot do it.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. The gentleman was only half a minute too late in offering his amendment.

Mr. KELSO. I have found, in my little experience, sometimes, that a great deal of time might be saved by asking questions. I would, therefore, ask the Chair whether, upon the second reading of a report, it would be in order to offer an entire new section? That is what we want to get at.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; the gentleman will have the right now to amend the report before the Convention in that way. Any time before the Convention goes entirely through the bill, it will be in order to introduce a blank section.

Mr. READ of Monroe. That is really what we desired to do in the case of the report just now under consideration.

PREAMBLE.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the preamble, or first part of the first section of the report of the committee on rights and privileges.

The section is as follows:

"SEC. —. We declare that all power is inherent in the people; and that all free governments are, and of right ought to be, founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, the people have, at all times, an inalienable right to alter and reform their government."

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall this preamble be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. HALL. Is it in order now to amend this preamble? I know that in the consideration of a bill before the Legislature, the title is the last thing which is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention, I believe, has reversed that order, and the Chair does not feel disposed to interfere with the decision.

Mr. HALL. How does the Chair decide?

The PRESIDENT: That it is in order to amend the preamble.

Mr. HALL. Then I move to strike out the preamble reported by the committee, and insert the following, which I will read:

"We, the people of the State of Indiana, acknowledging the gracious providence of God, in bestowing upon us the great and manifold blessings of a Christian civilization; and, in particular, in vouchsafing to us a condition of society in which the rights, social, political, and religious, conferred by Him on mankind, are recognized and respected; for the protection of these rights and the establishment of justice, liberty, and the general well-being, do solemnly ordain and establish this Constitution."

Mr. HALL said: Some weeks ago I received a memorial from sundry citizens of the county which I represent, to which was appended the preamble I have just read. Prior to the reception of the memorial, the committee on rights and privileges had reported to this Convention a preamble for the new Constitution. I therefore did not introduce the memorial, and ask for its reference, as I otherwise would have done; I reserved it for this occasion, intending to introduce it as a part of my remarks, when the subject came up for consideration before this Convention. Upon looking over the list of the many respectable signatures to this petition, I find amongst them the names of the Rev. John McMaster, Rev. A. T. Hendricks, Rev. Samuel Baldrige, and Rev. W. Shumate, clergymen of profound learning, and of a high order of talents. Sir, I need say nothing in favor of this preamble; it speaks for itself. It is chaste in style, and the sentiment is just what it ought to be.

We, as a Christian people, ought to acknowledge our gratitude to the All-wise Being for the manifold blessings he has bestowed upon us as a nation. It is a duty—a Christian duty. A friend, who writes to me on this subject, justly says: "That it has, on the part of religious and thinking persons, generally been considered a defect, greatly to be regretted, that, both in the Constitution of the United States and in that of our own State, there was no direct recognition of that Great and Glorious God, who plants a nation and plucks it up at his pleasure, and of our common Christianity. Had the votaries of Mahomet been framing such an important instrument, they would have begun: In the name of God and Mahomet, His Prophet. Thus the very Heathen reprove us in this matter. An opportunity is now offered us to remedy this defect, as far as our own Constitution is concerned." I trust the preamble I have read, so fitting for the occasion, will be adopted, and will conclude by calling for the yeas and nays upon the question.

drige, and ——— Shumate, and eighty-one others:

"We, the citizens of Gibson county, of various religious denominations, avowing hostility to all profane alliances between Church and State, and repudiating every form of persecution; yet, believing our civilization and morality to be Christian, would respectfully ask that such an acknowledgment be made in a preamble to our fundamental laws, and that this preamble be substantially as follows:

"PREAMBLE.

"We, the people of the Commonwealth of Indiana, acknowledging the gracious Providence of God in bestowing upon us the great and manifold blessings of a Christian civilization, and in particular in vouchsafing to us a condition of society in which the rights, social, political, and religious, conferred by Him on mankind, are recognized and respected; for the protection of these rights, and the establishment of justice, liberty, and the general well-being, do solemnly ordain and establish this

"CONSTITUTION:

"Farther, we would respectfully ask that the following alteration be made in article I, section 3: Strike out all the first sentence before the colon, and insert in its place as follows: 'The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this State, to all mankind.' Then, allowing the following part to remain as at present, add: 'But this liberty of conscience, worship, and profession secured, shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of this State.'"

Mr. BORDEN. I have in my hand the preamble of a Constitution, which I propose as an amendment to that proposed by the gentleman from Gibson. It is this:

"We, the people of the State of Indiana, acknowledging the goodness of God in vouchsafing to us a republican form of government, in order to establish justice, maintain public order, and perpetuate liberty, do ordain and establish this Constitution."

It is short and to the point. It is becoming, and I believe it is a duty which we owe to ourselves, in some solemn form like this, to acknowledge the goodness of God in vouchsafing to us a republican form of government.

Mr. OWEN. I have but a single word to say upon this subject; and that is on behalf of the committee on rights and privileges. In adopting the preamble which has been reported, we did so from a desire to make it as simple as possible; and we finally took up the preamble of the old Constitution, and agreed to adopt it as our model, striking out only those portions having special reference to the change from the Territorial to the State government.

Mr. BORDEN. I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment, and offer the following:

"Insert in the first line of the original preamble, after the word 'Indiana,' and before the word 'in,' the following words: 'Acknowledging our gratitude to God in permitting us to make choice of our form of government.'"

Mr. RARIDEN (speaking aside). It is great goodness in God to vouchsafe anything to such a set of fellows. [Merriment.]

Mr. BORDEN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson, by inserting after the word "well-being," the words "of society."

This amendment was rejected, and the question recurred upon Mr. HALL's motion to amend by way substitute.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I, sir, have as much reverence for the name of the Almighty as any member, perhaps, of this Convention. But I shall have no hesitation in voting against striking out, for the purpose of inserting a preamble furnished by the clergy of the State. I respect the reverend clergy, also, and I attend upon their public ministrations with pleasure; but whenever they step out of their sphere of influence; whenever they affect to dictate to the legislation of the country, they go beyond their privilege. If they are thankful to the Almighty, they ought also to be thankful to our fathers, the sturdy sires of the Revolution, that, by their prowess and their arms, they did vouchsafe to the clergy of this land the privilege of speaking their sentiments in the pulpit, and the protection of the laws in their work of enlightening the people with respect to the various tenets of doctrine which they teach. We have just as good a right to call upon all the schools of the various religious denominations in the State to send up the forms which they might severally prefer, and make our selection from amongst them, as to adopt this which has been sent to us from the clergy of the good county of Gibson—

Mr. HALL (interposing). I desire to explain. I believe there is not one in ten of the petitioners whose names I have sent up, who are clergymen. The petition comes from the people themselves. But, seeing the names of two clergymen amongst them, I named them here as distinguished for their high character.

Mr. MORRISON. I understand the gentleman to say that the character of those reverend gentlemen gave weight and consideration to the petition, because their names were attached to it.

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRISON. I would just as soon cast my vote with reference to the wishes of one man as another; and it certainly would make no difference with me whether he wore a brown coat or a black one; their voice should be heard with the same degree of consideration. I am no churchman, of any sect; and, therefore, I trust I can do justice to all. I would do injustice to none. But I am not hypocrite enough either to raise my voice or cast my vote in favor of what I believe to be right, or in opposition to what I believe to be wrong, for fear of offending against any man because he wears a black coat.

Mr. WOLFE. I propose to amend the original preamble, by inserting the words "civil and religious" after the word "liberty."

This amendment was rejected, and the question again recurred upon the substitute.

Mr. HOWE proposed to amend the original section, and said: As the section now stands, I shall feel myself bound to vote against it. It implies, I think, if it does not express, a principle which every republican should repudiate. It is not true that the people have a right to alter and reform their government without restriction, unless that right is specially reserved. We live under a written Constitution. There are two kinds of Constitutions; there is a written Constitution, which becomes a basis for future legislation—

The PRESIDENT (interrupting). The Chair would inform the gentleman that the question is in regard to the preamble, not the section.

Mr. HOWE. My amendment is intended to be applied to the section, and not to the preamble. If it is out of order, I withhold it.

Mr. McLEAN. I propose the following as a substitute for the original section and the amendment:

"We, the people of the State of Indiana, in Convention assembled, having been permitted, by the favor and patience of our constituents, to remain here so long, do ordain and establish this Constitution." [Merriment.]

This proposition being also rejected, the question again recurred upon Mr. HALL's amendment.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I was struck with the remark of the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) which was to this effect: that the clergy of the State should feel themselves peculiarly thankful to our fathers of the Revolution for having secured for them the exalted privilege of expressing their opinions in the pulpit. But now, with deference to that gentleman, I should think that he, as a politician, has just as much occasion as the reverend clergy to be thankful to our fathers for the privilege of expressing his political sentiments.

Mr. MORRISON (aside). I acknowledge it.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. But why should the gentleman affect any political disparagement because a man wears a black coat? For my part I will receive a man's advice with the same readiness, whether he wears a black or a grey coat; and I cannot but observe to the gentleman that his own coat is about as black as that of any of the reverend clergy in our State. And I will add, that to designate the clergy in this manner, and in such a place as this, it is calculated by an indirection to cast a slur upon the Christian profession, and it is, as I conceive, entirely improper and out of place here.

But, with reference to the matter before the Convention, I think that, assembled as we are in this place, in behalf of the people of a great State to establish the organic law, it behooves us especially to acknowledge our dependence upon the Supreme Being, from whose beneficent hand our people have received the greatest blessings, civil and religious, which have ever been vouchsafed to man, and I cannot think it would be at all improper for us solemnly to make this acknowledgement in the preamble to the Constitution, and it seems to me that on this account the Constitution would be received with more favor by the people. Certainly it becomes us here (as at all times we are in duty bound) to acknowledge our obligations to the Supreme Being, whose providence has elevated to so high a position amongst the States of this Union and the nations of the earth. Hence it is with great pleasure that I support and shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have a letter from a very intelligent gentleman residing in the county of Monroe, urging it upon me to support this preamble which comes to us from Gibson county. My correspondent says he has examined it and compared it with the preambles of several of the State Constitutions, and in his opinion there is not a single one of them all which is more correct and perspicuous in language and sentiment than that to which he referred—which is the same with that here presented by the gentleman from Gibson.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I wish to have the liberty to correct a misapprehension in regard to the position which I occupy upon this subject. I say that this Convention is simply and purely a political body, and that we ought not blindly to submit to have our action shaped according to the dictation of any body of ecclesiastics. I have as much reverence for religion, and for the reverend clergy, as any gentleman, but I see no necessity to support and encourage this spirit of officiousness.

In the history of all countries where the Christian religion prevails, we see a great deal of this kind of religious sentimentality connecting itself with legislation. If we turn back to English history, in the days of Cromwell and the "Praise-God-Parliament," we find that no action of the Government could be taken without some specification of religious opinions.

If it is the pleasure of the gentleman to say that the Almighty superintends all his works, and disposes the hearts of the people to do good, I assent to it all; but why is it necessary that these sentiments should be inscribed in the Constitution?

Again: why is it that certain gentlemen are so desirous to have a certain phraseology adopted in this preamble? Do they want to see a great hierarchy established in this country to overlook the affairs of State? If not, why do they seem to be so anxious to produce a certain result, or why have we been furnished with this declaration? I can see no reason at all for it, unless we were to make it an open question and invite all theological schools and colleges to come up here with their propositions.

Now here is this word "vouchsafe." It is an old word; I hardly know what it means, and would certainly have to go to a dictionary to ascertain its meaning fully; for it doubtless has more meaning, in a secondary sense, than any of us would be at once aware of. I consider it a word which would be much better understood in common prayer, or in a sermon, than in such a place as the gentleman from Gibson has proposed for it.

In regard to the notice which the gentleman from the north-west (Mr. Crumbacker) has taken of my allusion to the black coats of our clergymen, I have to say that I did not refer to the color of their coats by way of disparagement. But my meaning was, that the wearing of a peculiar kind of coats ought not to confer any peculiar privilege.

Mr. KELSO. I was not aware that there had been any importunity by way of letters upon this subject; and perhaps we have not yet had as many as might be profitable; therefore, for the purpose of giving all parties a fair chance to send up their letters, I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HARDIN. I demand a division of the question.

But the Convention refused to divide.

The yeas and nays being demanded, ordered, and taken upon this question, the vote was reported—yeas 9, nays 110—and recorded as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berry, Bicknell, Kelso, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Moore, Pettit, Rariden, and Spann—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—110.

So the Convention refused to lay on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to amend the original section by inserting, after the word "Indiana," the following words: "grateful to Almighty God for our freedom;" so that the preamble will read, "We, the people of Indiana, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to establish justice, maintain public order, and perpetuate liberty, do ordain this Constitution." I do think, Mr. President, that some recognition of an overruling Providence should be adopted here, at the same time, as an humble member of this body, I should be opposed to the adoption of any tedious preamble.

Mr. MURRAY. As one of the members of the committee which reported this preamble, I desire to say that we had several Constitutions before us, in which there was no acknowledgment of obligation to the Almighty Ruler; and that we endeavored upon comparison to select the simplest and shortest preamble. Not that we did not intend to acknowledge that we owe the highest duty to God, but that we did not think we were here as a synagogue to make a special appeal to the Divines for their advice in this matter. I make this statement whilst I feel perfectly aware that no member of the committee considers himself amenable to the charge of anti-religious views. I can have no objection at all to the language of the substitute; it is what I acknowledge every night and morning, and profess in my life. But I am unable to see any special necessity for introducing it into the amended Constitution.

Mr. OWEN. There is only one thing which I wish to say in addition to what has been advanced by the gentleman from Huntington, (Mr. Murray,) and I wish to say this because of the position which I occupy as chairman of the committee on rights and privileges. What I desire to say is this: that whatever may be the decision in regard to this matter—whether the preamble reported by the committee be adopted or rejected—I protest, in advance, that no inference ought to be drawn thence, with reference to the religious opinions of any member of the committee or of the Convention.

We have before us here a copy of the Constitution of the United States, the preamble of which reads as follows: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the bless-sings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." And, sir, no gentleman here would be willing to say or believe for a moment, but that a majority, or at least a very large minority of those men who drafted and adopted that Constitution—the most renowned Constitution which ever was adopted, and which I hope will stand forever—were men deeply impressed with a sense of religion. Nor should we forget that the President of that Convention—whose name stands at the close of that Constitution—George Washington—"first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—was a man against whose opinions, either civil or religious, not one word of blame was ever uttered.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would suggest to the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) a small modification of his amendment—merely to add, after the word "freedom," the words "civil or religious."

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Dearborn accept?

Mr. SMITH. Then I will move so to amend the amendment—

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; I accept that, of course.

The reading being called for, the preamble, as originally reported, and as proposed to be amended, was now read by the Secretary.

Mr. BORDEN. I doubt whether it can be made better than as the gentleman from Dearborn has proposed.

Mr. HALL. I would not trouble the Convention with any further remark, but I think the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) has been disposed to give to my words a sense different from that which the facts will justify. I expressly stated, that I found the petition signed by a number of the inhabitants of my county, and a number of the clergy. Amongst the latter, there are Baptists, New School and Old School Presbyterians, and Covenanters. The facts do not justify the idea that the petition was got up by clergymen. It is a petition emanating from the people; and any attempt to give it any other coloring cannot be justified either by the facts, or by what I said.

I understood the gentleman from Huntington (Mr. Murray) to say, that the committee had examined a number of the State Constitutions, and could find amongst them no precedent for acknowledging the Providence of God. Now I have just opened the book of State Constitutions in my hand, and the very first one, the Constitution of the State of Maine, contains this acknowledgment; and the Constitutions of Massachusetts and New York contain the same thing. I do not pretend to say that the gentleman is altogether mistaken; but here are precedents coming from most respectable sources, and I think it cannot be unsafe for us to follow in their wake.

I think, sir, that we ought to have a direct vote upon the amendment which I have offered. This way of interposing amendments I do not think is the proper way in which a petition of the people should be treated. Let us have a direct vote, and then, if it should appear that a majority are opposed to my proposition, I shall submit.

Mr. MURRAY. I did not say we had examined all the State Constitutions. I said we had several.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was now rejected, and the question recurred upon the adoption of Mr. HALL's substitute.

Mr. PETTIT. Is it in order to move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I move to lay the amendment upon the table, and call the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALL. That motion has been voted down once, I believe.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; the question before was to lay the section, with the amendments, upon the table.

The yeas and nays were now ordered and taken upon Mr. Pettit's motion, and the vote was reported—yeas 45, nays 70—and recorded as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzar, Foley, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Logan, Mathis, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Owen, Pettit, Rariden, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Terry, Thornton, Wheeler, and Wiley—45.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

So the Convention refused to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MARCH proposed to amend by inserting after the word "Indiana," in the first line of the original preamble, the words, "Grateful to Almighty God for our freedom."

Mr. HALL. For the sake of getting more directly at the vote upon the proposition which I have introduced, I will move to lay this amendment upon the table.

Mr. SHOUP. I demand the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table has precedence.

Mr. HALL. I withdraw my motion for the purpose of saving time.

Mr. BORDEN. Several gentlemen are opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall,) because it is too lengthy. [A voice—"Not at all."] I think the Convention would be willing to take the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) with the modification now proposed by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Marsh). The House has twice, by its vote, determined to insert some words of the kind.

Mr. SHOUP now again demanded the previous question.

And there was a second.

The main question being ordered—

The PRESIDENT said, the first question was upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. March); the next question upon the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) and then upon the engrossment.

Mr. OWEN demanded the yeas and nays upon Mr. March's amendment; and the same being ordered and taken, the vote was reported—yeas 107, nays 12—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Farrow, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—107.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bicknell, Blythe, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Crawford, Crumbacker, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Helm, and Walpole—12.

So the amendment was adopted; and the question recurred upon striking out the original preamble, as amended, and inserting that proposed by Mr. Hall.

And the yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered upon this question, they were now taken and reported—yeas 43, nays 72—and they were recorded as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Duzan, Foster, Gordon, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Sherrod, Shoup, Stevenson, Walpole, and Zenor—43.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Logan, March, Mathis, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Owen, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—72.

So Mr. Hall's amendment was rejected.

MR. WATTS. Is it in order now to amend? THE PRESIDENT. No, sir. We have yet another turn under the previous question.

And then the original preamble, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion by MR. LODHART,

The Convention now adjourned till to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

~~~~~ SATURDAY, Nov. 30, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. MR. FARROW.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MR. ZENOR presented a petition praying for the introduction of a clause prohibiting traffic in spirituous liquors.

The petition was read and referred to the committee on the legislative department.

MR. BIDDLE presented certain resolutions passed at a public meeting held at Logansport, in favor of a system of free banking, and in opposition to the establishment of a State Bank.

MR. BIDDLE remarked that as the committee on banking had reported, he did not know that it would be necessary to refer these resolutions to that committee. He moved that they be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and

The resolutions were laid upon the table.

The committees were called for reports.

No reports were made.

MR. OWEN. It will be recollected by the Convention that yesterday I gave notice that I would introduce an additional rule in regard to motions to reconsider—declaring that no such motion as to a section actually passed, shall be in order, unless such motion be made within three days after the passage of the section.

[Cries of "no," "no," and "consent."]

If gentlemen will bear with me for a moment, they may find no cause to dissent from what I am about to say. The notice given by me was chiefly prompted by the fact that a number of sections have been referred to our committee of revision, and it occurred to me, in the first instance, that it would be well to know whether the Convention had finally acted upon these before the committee proceeded to arrange and revise them.

Upon further reflection, however, I arrived at the conclusion, that the inconvenience or injury of such a rule might be greater than its advantages. It is true, indeed, that in most legislative bodies, a motion to re-consider must be made within twenty-four hours. But the sections we pass here are far more important than bills passed by a Legislature; and as I believe, that, upon the whole, it is best that we should reserve the right to re-consider at any time, if after-thought should chance to change our first opinions, I shall not move the rule at all. [Cries of "consent."]

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES OF CONGRESS.

MR. RARIDEN. Mr. President, as this is resolution day by our rules, I now propose to offer the resolutions I read the other day, in order to take a vote upon them. I will read them again to the Convention, so that they may be distinctly understood, as it is my intention to call the previous question without troubling the Convention with a word of comment.

MR. RARIDEN read the preamble and resolutions as heretofore published. [See Daily Journal, Nov. —.]

The reading of the resolutions was again called for, and they were again read by the Secretary.

MR. RARIDEN demanded the previous question.

MR. ANTHONY requested the gentleman from Wayne to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

MR. RARIDEN refused to withdraw the demand.

MR. PETTIT. I understand that the previous question is demanded; and therefore debate is of course out of order. I am afraid, sir, there is a cat in the meal tub, or a snake in the grass, and I move that the preamble and resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. RARIDEN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY inquired whether a motion to reject the resolutions would not take precedence of the motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT. A motion to lay on the table has precedence over all other motions, except a motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result—yeas 60, nays 57:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Balin-gall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Col-fax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Duzan, Garvin, Gootee, Gra-ham of Miami, Hardin, Hawkins, Howe, Kel-so, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, Milligan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carr, Chen-owith, Coats, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Ham-ilton, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Mc-Lean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoono-ver, Sherrod, Sims, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tannehill, Terry, Thornton, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—57.

So the preamble and resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. LOGAN offered the following resolu-tion:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be instructed to inquire of the Doorkeeper of this Convention if he furnishes the S'enogra-pher with stationery and candles; and if so, the amount, and report the same to this Con-vention.

The question being taken, the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. NOFSINGER offered the following res-olution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public In-stitutions of learning be instructed to report the following article, to-wit:

"It is the duty of the State to provide for the comfort and happiness of all its inhabitants, and especially the unfortunate, such as the Deaf and Dumb, the Blind, and the Insane; therefore it shall ever be the duty of the Gen-eral Assembly to cherish and support the various institutions erected in this State for their benefit."

The resolution lies over one day.

Mr. BORDEN offered the following resolu-tion:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an-nually dividing the interest on the University Fund among the several incorporated colleges of this State, in proportion to the number of students in each of said colleges during the year.

Mr. B. remarked, that this course was pur-sued in several of the States. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted, and that the committee would make an investigation in rela-tion to the subject.

Mr. FOSTER said, he hoped the resolution would not be adopted. He did not know how the gentleman could expect such a resolution to pass, when he must be aware that the com-pact upon which the land was granted, required that it should be strictly applied to the uses of the State University; and that it should not be diverted without the co-action or co-operation of Congress. And even then it was doubtful whether it could be done. He did not wish to enter into an argument upon the subject, but he was prepared, at any time, to show the mis-chievous effects that such a disposition of this fund, would produce. It would only be building up sectarianism.

Mr. BORDEN. I hope the gentleman will allow the resolution to go to the committee, and when the subject comes back to us, and comes up for consideration, I shall be pre-pared to meet the gentleman in argument upon the question.

Mr. WOLFE. It appears to me to be hardly necessary to send this matter to a committee. The subject has been already referred, and the committee have reported that the fund cannot be transferred. If it could, I presume that the Convention would decide that it should be di-vided, not among the colleges, but among the common schools of the State.

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman says that the committee have come to the conclusion that the fund ought to go to the common schools, and not to the colleges. I submit to him wheth-er the Convention may not provide that all the Colleges shall constitute the University of the State. In some of the States of the Union they have a board of regents to manage the University Fund, and the same is divided out among the Colleges. Mind you, an University is made up of Colleges. I think the subject is at least worthy of consideration. I came here instructed on this subject. The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) says, it would be building up sectarianism. Well I do not know that there is more sectarianism in the College at Greencastle than there is in the College at Bloomington. Now, sir, I am not strenuous upon this subject, but the resolution only proposes an inquiry into the subject—let it go to the committee, and let them make a report upon it.

MR. READ of Monroe. MR. PRESIDENT, I would like to make a few remarks on this subject.

The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) says, it has been the practice in other States to divide the University fund among different institutions. Now, sir, I undertake to say, that such a thing as seizing upon the fund once given for the founding of a college, and diverting it to a different purpose, has never yet occurred in a single American State. Least of all, has anything of the kind taken place in the State of New York, a State, the policy of which on the subject of education, has been eminently wise and liberal. That State has given munificently from her own treasury to her different Colleges. From no one of them has she ever taken, or even proposed to take a single dollar.

There is in that State a body called the Regents of the University. This body has at its control a fund called the literature fund, which is distributed under their direction to the different Academies in the State, and in a few instances something has been given from this fund to Colleges. But of the immense donations made by the State to Union College and to other institutions, the State never attempted to reclaim any part, or to take from one institution and give to another. Nor has any such proposition ever been made there.

In the very inception of the system for the disposing of the public lands, Congress adopted and settled a policy in making a provision for education in the new States, which was wise and liberal. That policy has been continued as eminently beneficial to the present time. Well, sir, what is it? Congress has made large donations from the public lands for the purpose of common schools, and has reserved, in comparison therewith, a very small quantity of land—the merest minimum—for the endowment of higher institutions of learning. In this State the terms of the grant were for a seminary of learning.

Well, sir, in each of the new States, in consequence of this provision of the General Government, a College has sprung into existence, almost as soon as the State government has been formed. Young men in our new settlements in moderate circumstances, have had the means of higher education brought home to them.

The opinion prevails with some, that Colleges are for the rich only. This is utterly a mistake, and without facts to sustain it. I appeal to every gentleman who knows anything of Colleges, if the greater portion of the students are not from the humbler walks of life—some from the very humblest. What is it to the man of wealth, if there were not a College within a thousand miles? He can send his sons to other States, to Europe even. But the poor youth must have the means of education near at hand, or go without it.

It was, I hold, a wise policy on the part of the general Government, to make provision which would secure higher institutions of education in all the new States, with their very origin. Shall Indiana be the first State to condemn this policy of Congress? Indiana has never given a dollar to the University. The fund is a mere trust for a specific purpose. The State of Indiana is the trustee, and nothing else. She is not the donor of any part of the fund. Its diversion to any other object, than that for which it was given by Congress, would be an act of repudiation, and unworthy the State. It would be casting back a gift which has been generously bestowed for a noble purpose.

What, sir, would be thought of the United States Government, if after having received the Smithsonian Fund, (and in so doing accepted a sacred trust,) after having erected buildings, purchased a library, apparatus, &c., for the institution which that Fund was designed to endow, Congress should seriously set about the inquiry whether there was not something else to which the Fund might be appropriated?

But my present purpose was merely to correct the statement as to the action in like cases by other States.

MR. KELSO. This resolution proposes nothing more than to inquire into the propriety of doing or not doing a certain thing. I have not bestowed much thought upon the subject, as to whether we have the power to make a different application of the fund from that which has been made for years past. But if we have the power to make a different application of it, I maintain that to divide it among the common schools would be a better application of it, than to divide it among the colleges. I am not prepared to say that we have the power, but I am prepared to say that we should gain something by allowing the resolution to go to the committee, and letting the subject be investigated. It is a very fine thing to have a good education, but education alone does not give a man capacity. I had the good fortune to get ten months and a half instruction in a log-cabin school house, and yet gentlemen who have had the advantage of college education may bring in propositions here for discussion, and I will meet them in argument and be very apt to give them some trouble, too. [A laugh]. A man must have a head, or else all the education in the world will be of little avail.

MR. READ of Monroe. I am not disputing that.

MR. KELSO. I know the gentleman does not. I am not sure, sir, about the propriety of dividing this money among colleges. I think it should go to the common schools. I have no great charity for colleges; they never did me much good. But about sectarianism. There was in 1834, a struggle as to who should be installed as professors. And the moment they proceeded to put in a Methodist, I never saw such a broil created in my life. One denomination having got the control, they seem disposed to keep it if they possibly could.

Now there can be, to say the least, no impropriety in letting this resolution go to the committee, and having the subject investigated. I remember when the practice in Indiana was, and it was a practice that was corrected by law, that all recognizances that were forfeited to the State, were applied to the use of seminaries of learning. In 1844, we sent a resolution of this character to a committee. The subject was inquired into, and it was determined that the forfeitures might be applied to common schools; and they were so applied, and the common schools have been considerably benefited in consequence of such application of them. Now we might, with little labor, find out that we may dispose of this fund more legitimately and properly than we have heretofore done. It is, I think, at all events, worthy of inquiry.

Mr. WATTS. I have grown up sir, in the same neighborhood with my worthy friend from Switzerland, and I am similarly situated in point of education, with himself. I am, like him, not college bred, but I always thought that as great a misfortune as it is to be college bred, it was better to be college bred, than to have no breeding at all. ["Consent"—"Laughter"]

But to the question. This subject matter, sir, has been referred to a committee, It has been investigated by the committee, and the committee have reported that these funds cannot be diverted. They have examined all the authorities upon the subject, and I do not see any necessity for traveling over the same ground again. If it is the shortest way of getting rid of this resolution, however, I have no objection; for my object is to get rid of it in some way or other.

Mr. READ of Monroe. It is not my object to get rid of the inquiry.

Mr. WOLFE moved to strike out the word "colleges," and insert the words "common schools."

Mr. FOSTER. I would barely remark that I am much obliged to the gentleman from Sullivan for having investigated the subject in relation to common schools; and certainly, no committee have recommended that the fund should be divided among the colleges of the State. The gentleman from Allen, I suppose, is mistaken in the position he has assumed, that a collection of colleges, constitutes a university. In England, the universities of Oxford and of Cambridge, are composed of fifteen or twenty colleges each, but each college has its own separate funds. They are all contiguous to each other, yet were all founded by different individuals, and supported by their own funds, and not by what is called the university fund. In England, we know that sectarianism prevails, but that cannot be urged against our institutions of learning. It is not long since, the President of our University published a pamphlet declaring that sectarianism is heresy. In regard to what the gentleman from Switzerland has represented as having occurred some years ago, I am not able to say, but I know that it has been the endeavor to select the trustees from among the various religious sects, so that one should have no superiority over the other. With regard to the professors, they are of various religious denominations.

If it were left to my choice, I should have no hesitation in saying that I would appropriate the fund to common school purposes, rather than devote it to the use of the colleges, and I am sure that the Convention will not sustain such a proposition.

Mr. KELSO. My main object in rising now, is to suggest to the gentleman from Sullivan (Mr. Wolfe) so to frame his resolution, that the inquiry may be whether the application could be made to the colleges of the State, or to common schools, and let them have the benefit of both grounds.

Mr. WOLFE. I accept the suggestion and will so frame the resolution.

Mr. KELSO. While I am up I want to say one word to my friend from Monroe (Mr. Foster) for the purpose of brushing up his recollection when he says that there is nothing of a sectarian character about that institution. I want to know whether he had not a contest with President Wiley on the subject, and whether he did not beat him.

Mr. HOLMAN observed that this was a subject of great interest, and that it had already been before the Convention in the shape of a resolution of inquiry. The committee on education had already made their report, and he had great respect for that committee, and for its chairman. That committee had reported that the fund could not be, consistently with the grant in which it originated, be diverted from the State University. He presumed that no gentleman of information would object to having the matter properly investigated; and it might be presumed, inasmuch as the committee on education had already examined the matter and made their report, the report which they would hereafter make, would be in consonance with that which they had already made. On that ground he would move as an amendment to the motion to refer the resolution to the committee on education, to refer it to a select committee of nine, and that the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) be chairman of that committee.

Mr. BORDEN. I accept of that proposition. Perhaps it would be better to refer the resolution to a select committee, although I have no desire to be placed at its head as chairman.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not see the necessity of consuming the time of the Convention upon a matter which has been already settled. The Supreme Court gave an opinion yesterday, showing conclusively that the Legislature had no power over that Fund; that it belongs to Congress exclusively to make any further disposition of it. I have traveled over the whole ground, and that is settled to my entire satisfaction.

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman from Delaware may be very well informed of the fact; but it might be well to make the inquiry whether it could not be divided amongst the colleges.

Mr. KELSO. The decision of the Supreme Court is as to who were the proper owners of the land; and I believe that there are some here who know just as much about it as the Supreme Court. I do not pretend to do so; but I believe others do. [A laugh.]

Mr. FOSTER. I merely wish to say one word in explanation of what fell from the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) in reference to my having a fight or a contest with the President of the Institution, in regard to sectarianism. No charge was made against the President of the College on account of sectarianism; but there were other and very grave charges against him, of which the gentleman from Dearborn is well aware, for he was present on the committee of investigation.

The question was taken on the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. OWEN. I have a resolution to offer, and in introducing it I wish to say two or three words. From several movements which have been made in this Convention—one by the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) one by the gentleman from Jennings, (Mr. Spann,) and one by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden)—it must be evident that there is a desire that some constitutional provision should be made with reference to our laws of descent, securing to the widow in case of the death of her husband, intestate or not intestate, a larger amount of her husband's property than she now has. I offer this merely as a resolution of inquiry. The resolution was to the effect that the committee on rights and privileges be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a section providing that the life rental of all real estate of which an intestate husband shall die seized, shall be secured to his widow, under equitable conditions by law.

The question being taken on the resolution it was adopted—ayes 50, noes 43.

Mr. MORRISON offered a resolution on the same subject, but he said it would go a great deal further in reference to children than any resolution that had yet been offered. It was that the committee on rights and privileges be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting this section—

That the Legislature shall pass such laws as will more perfectly and extensively protect the rights of widows out of the property of their deceased husbands, and also providing for the children of deceased parents a more equal use of the property of the decedent.

The amendment was adopted by consent.

Mr. TAYLOR offered a resolution to the effect that the committee on the legislative department be requested to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the Legislature from passing any law authorizing special copartnerships in this State. He observed that if there had been any other resolution offered on this subject, he would withdraw his resolution, but he was not aware of any such; and he thought that the object to be accomplished by the resolution was one of too much importance to be omitted by the Convention. It was known to the Convention that in some of the States special copartnerships were authorized. He had had some experience on this subject, and he looked upon this system as nothing more nor less than licensing swindling in the body politic. He hoped that there would be no objection to the inquiry. Every man was aware that men of wealth availed themselves of this kind of special legislation for speculative purposes. They would enter a concern as special partners, invest a few thousand dollars of ready capital, which would go out as the capital of all the partners. They would work away perhaps for four or five years, and get into an enormous credit, merely on account of the little capital invested by the special partner, and would break down in the end, carrying the honest and industrious with them in their fall. All this was, in many instances, the result of these partnerships. It might be true that all the provisions of the law had been complied with in regard to such partnerships, such as advertising, &c., but this was all forgotten in the course of two or three years, and the special partner was regarded as a general partner, and credited the concern on that supposition. Then, when the crash came, it was discovered that this partner, on whose account perhaps an immense amount of credit had been given, was only liable to the amount of his capital originally invested, and the general partners being worth little or nothing, the creditors were thus swindled by false appearances. He thought such a system should be constitutionally prohibited.

Mr. KELSO. In partnership transactions every partner is liable to the full extent of his capital.

Mr. TAYLOR. But I am speaking of special partners, who are only liable to the amount of capital invested.

Mr. KELSO. I maintain it that in partnership transactions every partner is liable to the extent of his last dollar. Now where there are special corporate powers granted to special corporations, it is a different thing to men going into partnership in the transaction of business. It was a part of our business in coming here to put down the granting of these special corporate powers. The doctrine of the gentleman from Laporte would be correct if it related to these; but in ordinary partnerships I think it cannot have any application; and I hope the Convention will not do any act by which men will be prevented from joining their capital together in business as partners.

Mr. TAYLOR. The gentleman from Switzerland totally misapprehends me. I am not seeking at all to prevent men from going into partnership. My object is to do away with this thing of special partners who are only responsible to the creditors of a concern for so much of the capital as such special partners have invested in it and no more. I suppose the gentleman is quite aware that a separate act of the Legislature, authorizing special partnerships, is quite a different thing from a general partnership in which all the partners are liable to the full amount of their capital.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WATTS offered a resolution to the effect that the Convention should adjourn sine die in two weeks from Monday next.

Mr. KELSO moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE moved that when the Convention adjourn on Tuesday next, it adjourn until the fourth Monday in December.

Mr. LOCKHART moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved that the committee on matters appertaining to criminal law be instructed to report a section to the following effect:

"Embezzlement of the public money shall be deemed felony, and be subject to such punishment as the General Assembly shall prescribe."

Mr. OWEN. I think that is an imperative resolution. I would suggest to the mover of it whether, if everything were stricken out after the word "felony," his object would not be obtained. If we declare such embezzlement felony, it will be punished as such, of course.

The resolution laid over under the rule.

Mr. THORNTON offered a resolution to the effect that the committee on education be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing in the new Constitution about to be adopted, that lands returned delinquent in the payment of State and county revenue, shall not be sold therefore so as to enable private individuals to purchase them, but that they shall be forfeited to the State for the benefit of common schools. With the permission of the Convention, he would explain his object in a very few words. In the year 1832 he had had the honor of a seat in the Legislature, when an act of this kind was passed. At that time a great deal of heartless speculation was going on, and he had not unfrequently witnessed valuable property sold for a few cents, and the title vested in the purchaser—notwithstanding such property was of great value. It was necessary, as every one would admit, to have stringent laws for the collection of the revenue; but it appeared to him that the course which he proposed seemed better calculated to subserve the ends of justice than the present mode, and at the same time to furnish an ample fund for one of the most important purposes. It might, perhaps, for a time make a great inroad upon the revenue of the State; but taking everything into consideration, it would prevent a system of the most heartless speculation, and among other advantages it contained a salutary provision for the benefit of the community in general. In 1832 the principle involved in this resolution was adopted almost unanimously, and was continued in force by an act of the Legislature till the year 1841 or 1842, when it was repealed.

He would remark, that when real estate was purchased for taxes it was seldom that the title could be sustained. He had had an extensive practice as a lawyer in this State, and he hardly knew of a solitary case in which the title to lands thus purchased had been sustained. The rigid construction of the law on the subject, generally operated as a defeat to the title of the purchaser. It did sometimes happen that titles of that kind were good, but the instances were very rare in comparison with those on the other side of the case. It seemed to him, then, the principle involved in the resolution was one that ought to be adopted. The resolution was only a resolution of inquiry, and it was for the Convention to say whether they deemed the subject worth inquiring into. So far as he was concerned, he should like to see it adopted.

Mr. CLARKE of Tippecanoe. I have no objection to this resolution, as a mere resolution of inquiry, but I protest against the principle involved in it. The gentleman tells us that the old law operated badly, because the property was sold to private individuals. If it operated badly on that ground, it would operate with equally evil effects if purchased by the State. If it be wrong to sell the property of one individual to another for the payment of taxes due to a county or State, it would be equally wrong to sell such property to the State. Besides the gentleman tells us that those tax titles are seldom good when sold to individuals. So it would be if the land were sold to the State.

Now I maintain that the principle is wrong altogether. The State has only a claim upon the land for the amount of taxes due, and has only a right to sell so much property as will pay those taxes. It has no right whatever to declare the property forfeited.

Mr. READ of Clarke. I have no doubt whatever that my friend from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) is actuated by the best of motives in introducing this resolution. It is quite true that in the year 1832, the Legislature did pass a law of the kind he mentions; but they very soon found that it resulted in very bad effects. One of those effects was that the law pressed very hardly upon the poor. How did it work? Why just in this way. When the property had been sold, the owner of it had to pay the last cent, both of purchase money and interest and expenses, before he could reclaim his title. Sometimes, indeed, the land was purchased in by a neighbor, who had the money, which his poorer neighbor did not possess, and he would restore the title without charging any interest. But these were cases which rarely happen, and in nineteen cases out of twenty, the land went into the hands of speculators, who exacted the last farthing, or retained the land. Thus it was that the law of 1832 operated very harshly upon the poor man, and favored those who were more fortunately circumstanced, and the Legislature finding that such were its effects, very soon repealed it; and no Legislature has attempted to pass any similar law, from that day to this. Believing that such a law would work very injuriously both to the interests of the poor land owner, and to the State, I shall move to lay the resolution on the table. I do not see that there is any use in occupying the time of a committee with such a proposition. They would have to make a report, which would only encumber the journal, give the Convention trouble, and produce no good effect.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman from Clark withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table for a few moments?

Mr. READ. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR. As this appears to me to be a question of great importance, I desire to make a few observations to the Convention on the subject. It appears to me that this is a question which ought to claim from the Convention the coolest deliberation. Anything relating to taxes, or to the title of real estate, demands from the Convention the most serious and deliberate consideration. The tax system, for many years past, in many of the sister States, has been the same; and, according to that system, an individual may purchase the land of his neighbor at a sale for taxes, and charge him a hundred per cent. for the use of the money. In some States, from one to two years are given for redemption of the property. In New York, however, the land is struck off to the State; and I think that is the best plan, and I will give my reasons for thinking so. This mode can do no person any harm, except the land speculators who hang about the office of the county clerk or county commissioners, and purchase lands to speculate in. What is the consequence of this? Why, that all the lands that are not worth the taxes, are knocked off to the State. Nobody will buy them. If they are not redeemed, they remain in the hands of the State. All persons having lands that are worth more than the taxes, or more than they have been knocked off for, will be sure to redeem them within the time specified by law; and if they do not redeem them, the best way is to allow the State to receive them and apply their proceeds to the purposes of common schools. In some instances the parties may not redeem them; and in such case let the land be taken up and sold for the highest consideration that can be obtained for them; and let the overplus, if there be any, after paying the taxes and cost and interest be restored to the owner, or his heirs, but never let the title be litigated.

This mode would do away with all attempts to deceive a man—attempts that in times past, have been too successfully practiced. I have seen a man having, say 160 acres of land sold, when he was there to pay the charges upon it. And this has been done by dividing the lot, say into two, of eighty acres; and the man knowing that his lot contained a hundred and sixty acres, did not know that it was his own land that was being sold, because the sheriff or treasurer was selling only eighty acres. And when the land was redeemed, he had to pay double costs in every way.

As the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) has said, it will sometimes happen that a man may purchase the land of his neighbor, and restore to him the title, without charging a cent of interest. But he has a right to charge this hundred per cent. interest, and in nineteen cases out of twenty it is done.

Now such a provision as this, I think, will work well. Let all the delinquent lands be advertised. And every man, knowing that his land is advertised, will pay his taxes within six or twelve months; and if he does not, why, then let the State get the benefit of it. Let the State then put up the land and sell it to the highest bidder; and let the State give a good title; and if there be any balance over and above the charges on the land and the interest, let it be handed to the owner; or, if the owner cannot be found, let it be deposited in the State treasury, without interest, for the use of the owner or his heirs, if they ever should be found. That mode will prevent any man from ever losing his entire tract of land, for the sake of five or ten dollars taxes. The land, in such case, will be in the hands of the State; and, if she acts, as she certainly would act,—having no desire to oppress her citizens—and if they come within one or two years, or whatever time is specified, and redeem the land, then there is no harm done; the State receives the interest, and it goes into the school fund. If it is not redeemed, the State loses nothing by having the land. If it is worth nothing, it falls back into the hands of the State anyhow; and if it is worth redemption, it is sure to be redeemed. And if in some cases valuable lands should not be redeemed, what is to prevent the State from disposing of it for more than the five or ten dollars charge upon it? I believe that a statute could be framed that would better answer the wishes of the people, and better secure the revenue than that which is now in force. Thus, if a man paid a hundred per cent. for the redemption of his land to the State, it would only be like putting it out of one pocket into another, for he would receive the benefit of it in increased facilities for the education of his children. I hope, therefore, that this resolution may be permitted to go to the committee on education.

Mr. GIBSON of Clark moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting:

"That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into and report the best method of enforcing the payment of taxes."

He said that there was something wrong in the present system, which ought to be amended. You would not unfrequently see a tract of land put up, worth a thousand dollars, and the question would be asked: "Who would pay the taxes for the smallest portion of the land?" It was necessary that the taxes should be promptly paid, and equally necessary that a part of the land should be sold to pay them; but it not unfrequently happened—yea, in nine cases out of ten—the whole tract was sold, when a part of it would have been quite enough to have secured the payment of such taxes. The man who purchases land in this way, buys under the merest chance in the world of getting a good title. The Supreme Court, in all such cases where land titles are in dispute, requires the most perfect compliance with the law, which, in many instances, it is not within the means of human ingenuity to do. The statute of 1824 says that the deed shall be "conclusive evidence" of the regularity of the sale; but the Supreme Court says it is only prima facie evidence. If we can do anything in this Convention that will stop this construction, or rather destruction of the law by the Supreme Court, it would be well; so that when a man goes to a sale and offers to purchase two or three acres for the amount of taxes, interest, and cost charged against the land, he may know that his title would be good. This is the kind of provision, I think, that we want; and it would not operate unjustly upon any party.

Mr. THORNTON. This is the first and only resolution I have yet had the honor of presenting to this Convention—one in regard to which I have received instructions from a very respectable portion of those constituents whom I represent on this floor. I hope the Convention will not stifle it by adopting the amendment. I am perfectly aware of the truth of what has been said by my friend from Clark (Mr. Gibson). I have had some experience on the subject, and I know how it operates. I have known cases in which a court has decided that the omission of the collector or assessor to endorse his name on the back of his return, was a fatal defect, and resulted in the defeat of title. I concur with the gentleman in regard to what has fallen from him in reference to the course usually pursued by the Supreme Court. They have, in many respects, adopted a system of legislation, rather than of judicial construction; and it certainly would be well if we could have something definite upon this subject. I hope that the Convention will permit this resolution to go to the proper committee. If it does no good, I cannot see that it can do any harm.

One word now in reply to the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read). I fear he had a hand in repealing this law; but it was not repealed quite so soon as he seemed to suppose. It was adopted in 1832, and was not repealed until some ten or twelve years afterwards; and, although the law was badly executed, I do not think that that is any objection to the principle of it. I would like to see the principle adopted and incorporated into our system. The people do not submit very readily to be taxed, even for the good purpose of education—especially bachelors (a laugh) and those who never knew what it was to be the father of a child. If we could only have some mode of indirect taxation for the purposes of education, I think the people would willingly submit to it. The only objection that I can see to this proposition is, that it might reduce the revenue, but it could do other harm. I have not introduced this resolution, I assure the Convention, for the purpose of making Buncombe. Far from that. I have introduced it because I regard it as containing a salutary principle which I think ought to be incorporated into our system. I will go as far as any other man to sustain the common schools, and this is a proposition to create a fund to conduce to that much desired object. The present system is bad and requires a remedy. I have known land sold near the city of New Albany, for sixty cents, for which the owner would not now take two thousand dollars an acre. Now this system of heartless speculation should be put an end to. That is one reason why our courts have resorted to such a system of construction as that which they now adopt, in reference to titles of lands sold for taxes.

The only question now is, will the Convention allow the resolution to go to the committee? If the Convention think it ought not to go to the committee on education, or to any other committee, I will cheerfully acquiesce, although I cannot but entertain the opinion that a very salutary principle is involved in the resolution—one which, if carried out, would do no harm, while it would effect much good.

Mr. GIBSON. I did not intend by any means to stifle the resolution of the gentleman by offering my amendment. It includes in it everything contained in his resolution, but is more extensive inasmuch as it does not confine the committee to any particular mode. I rose, however, for the purpose of moving to change the reference in this way—that the resolution be referred to a select committee, of which the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) shall be the chairman.

Mr. KENT. As the gentleman from Floyd says this is the first resolution which he has offered here, and it is merely one of inquiry, I think that courtesy requires that we should accede to the motion of reference.

After some conversation,

Mr. GIBSON moved to refer the resolution to a select committee of five, Mr. Thornton to be the chairman.

Mr. SPANN moved to amend the motion of Mr. Gibson by making the committee to consist of one member from each Congressional district.

Mr. READ of Clark rose to explain that his opposition to the principle contained in the resolution was general, not special. He was not aware that his friend from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) felt any anxiety about having the resolution referred, or he would not have objected. He would take back a part of his remarks—that part which urged that there was no necessity for referring the resolution to a committee.

The question was then taken on the amendment, constituting the committee of one from each Congressional district and it was adopted by consent.

And the question then recurring on the motion to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Floyd to said committee, it was agreed to by consent.

Mr. BOWERS offered a resolution to the following effect:

“That the several standing committees be discharged from the further consideration of all matters referred to them, and that the Constitution, as adopted on the 29th of June, A. D. 1816, be referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology, with instructions to amend the same, so as to provide for biennial sessions of the Legislature, instead of annual sessions; the election of all officers by the people, and the applying of all funds arising from fines and forfeitures, to the support of common schools, instead of applying them to the support of county seminaries, and to report the same back to the Convention, so amended, with as little delay as possible; and that this Convention now adjourn until Monday next, at two o'clock, P. M., to enable said committee to discharge the duties required of them by this resolution.”

Mr. KENT moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BOWERS called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDENT said he would remark to the Convention that this resolution was not in order. By the 44th Rule it was provided that any resolution or other proposition, introduced by any delegate, for the purpose of referring the same to any standing committee, shall embrace one subject only. The gentleman's proposition embraces several subjects, and it cannot, therefore, be entertained.

Mr. BOWERS. Then I ask leave to withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT. There is no necessity to ask leave to withdraw it, for it is not here. It cannot be entertained.

MR. RARIDEN'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. SHOUP. I move that the Convention re-consider the motion by which the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) this morning were laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope that motion will not be re-considered. I should not have offered it if the gentleman from Wayne had not called the previous question.

Mr. RARIDEN. I will withdraw the call. Mr. PETTIT. I hope this vote will not be re-considered. A long string of resolutions are introduced here by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden), and the previous question is called for to gag us without an opportunity either of seeing them in print or of hearing them read—except as the gentleman himself read them, and I will not comment on his fine reading—and as they were read once by the clerk—an allopathic dose of political medicine administered by that gentleman. I thought, sir, that there was a cat in the tub—a snake in the grass. I will say to the Convention that if one of my own political friends in whom I had the utmost confidence had introduced that string of resolutions, or any others as long, I would not have voted for them—much less would I vote for them coming from the source from which they did. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I have not said heretofore one word about politics in this Convention. It has been said by a dozen members on this floor who have been the readiest to break through all restraint, that we came here to drop all party feelings, all prejudices, and the very gentlemen who are the most clamorous for that proposition are the very first to mix up political doses and try to ram them down the throats of the members of this Convention.

Sir, these resolutions have no business here, though they are as true as truth itself. We do not speak for the State on this subject; the Legislature has soon to be in session, and let them endorse these resolutions if they will. I am satisfied they should. I give my hearty assent and approval to the whole policy of the measures of last winter, called the compromise measures, not that they are every one right in detail; but in their principles I hold that they are right. Sir, I may be allowed to say—and I think it is no digression from this proposition—that I approve of all these measures. But here is a long string of resolutions with an assumption that these measures were all necessary on account of the slavery agitation. Now I do not believe it. In the first place it was the plain Constitutional and absolute duty of Congress to admit California; they ought to have admitted her on the second day of the session. Not, however, because of the slavery agitation, but because she was within our jurisdiction; because our population had settled there; because we owned the territory, and because the people of California had formed a State Constitution and Government; and not because, as is assumed in that preamble, that the slavery agitation made it necessary that California should be admitted as a State into the Union. No such thing, sir. There is no truth in it at all. Was it necessary to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia because of the slavery agitation? Not at all. It was not called for by any such considerations. Was it necessary to pass the fugitive slave bill on account of the slavery agitation? There is more truth in the application of these words to this law than to any of the others, for there was no necessity that any of the other measures should be passed on account of that agitation. Was it necessary to pass the Texas boundary bill, or to provide Territorial Governments for Utah and New Mexico, on account of this agitation? Not at all; not at all.

Now is it necessary to pass this string of resolutions, endorsing every sentence, every line, every syllable? It is not necessary at all. It is none of our business. We were not sent here to do anything of the kind, and while I say that I give my hearty assent and approval to the principle of the measures of last winter, I utterly repudiate one or two of the features of the fugitive slave bill. I never would have voted for that bill in its present form without trying to amend it. I never would have voted for it without, in the first place, proposing so to amend it that the certificate of the commissioner should not be conclusive evidence, but merely prima facie evidence.

Now all those who favor the measure, glory in the idea that Governor Crittenden gave it as his opinion that the law is Constitutional. Who ever doubted its constitutionality? I did not suppose that the veriest dolt in the Union would doubt its constitutionality. The whole question of catching runaway servants, is a right that is transferred to Congress. The States have nothing whatever to do with it. Anything that the States may do individually, and independently of Congress, is wholly nugatory. They cannot add to or take from the power of Congress.

But then Governor Crittenden says, that this law does not suspend the writ of habeas corpus.

That, sir, is a mockery—nothing but a mockery. He says the writ of habeas corpus may issue. So it may; and then the slave owner comes in and says, "Here is my certificate," and then the Judge is compelled to discharge the writ of habeas corpus. The certificate of the Commissioner is conclusive as to the master's right to remove the fugitive. Whereas a full examination ought to be allowed before a learned Judge on its merits. And it applies equally to the indentured apprentice, who may leave his master and abscond into another State. If the Yankee apprentice who is learning to make wooden nutmegs, should run away and come into Indiana, under that law the man to whom he was apprenticed may recapture him, and take him back. It applies not only to negroes but to white apprentices. The objection then, that I make to the law, is not to its principles but to its details—that is that the certificate should not be conclusive, but prima facie evidence of the right.

Now these resolutions we shall see in print in the papers on Monday morning. There is no necessity of going to the expense of printing them by the Convention. The newspapers will print them. We shall have them on Monday morning in our papers; and we can then judge whether it would be wise and proper to adopt them, or whether they ought to be amended, or whether they express the sentiments and language of this House, or not.

Sir, I am not in the habit of taking political doses of medicine of anykind, from political opponents. The gentleman has introduced the matter here and it must be met accordingly.

Mr. RARIDEN. I can assure the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr Pettit,) that I had no intention in the introduction of this series of resolutions and preamble, that they relate to any, except two political parties which I recognize—and that is the Union party and the Anti-Union party.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). Oh, the Union party is only another name for the old federalist party.

Mr. RARIDEN. The gentleman may adopt the name or reject it, as he may think proper. It makes but little difference to me; but let me tell him, before I go any further, that as to his having confidence in my political integrity, I shall not lose much sleep about that hereafter. Without impeaching the gentleman's candor I desire to show that he has a behind-the-bush opposition to these resolutions, which he does not disclose.

Now he denounces the idea of these measures having arisen out of the question of slavery. He says that they arose out of the Mexican war—that California should have been admitted at once, &c. I perfectly agree with him; but is there a member of this House, that doubts that if there had been no sensibility on the subject of negro slavery, there would have been any opposition to her admission? Is any gentleman prepared—

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order, and I think I have a high authority upon the subject, that will settle the matter. I understand that this motion is not debatable; and I understand so by repeated instances of the kind that have occurred in the House of Representatives at Washington, and other deliberative bodies. The point of order is, that the House having decided to lay a motion upon the table, a motion to take up that motion from the table is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT. But this is not a motion to take the resolution from the table. It is a motion to re-consider the vote by which they were laid on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. But it applies equally to a motion to re-consider. Here is the authority: "The motion made by Mr. Hopkins, on the 23d instant, that the House do re-consider the vote of the 22d instant, on the motion that the said memorial and petition do lie on the table, came up for consideration, and the question was stated by the Speaker; when

Mr. Everett inquired of the Speaker, whether the motion to re-consider was subject to debate.

The Speaker decided that inasmuch as by the rules of the House, the motion to lie on the table "shall be decided without debate," the motion to re-consider a vote of the House, or a motion to "lie on the table" must be decided without debate.

From this decision Mr. Everett took an appeal to the House, but subsequently withdrew the same."

I understand that a motion to take from the table is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already informed the gentleman that that is not a motion to take from the table, but a motion to re-consider.

Mr. BORDEN. In the situation in which this question is placed, I regard the motions as the same.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman from Allen is not satisfied with the decision of the Chair, he can take an appeal.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not disposed to quarrel with the decision of the Chair. I shall not take an appeal.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Wayne will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. RARIDEN. I hope that none of this mis-spent time will be taken out of my half hour, for, if that rule were to prevail, then a man might be so situated as not to get an opportunity to speak at all, by reason of such untimely interruptions.

I shall proceed regularly to reply to the gentleman from Tippecanoe; and I say again that it is my object to demonstrate from the gentleman's own remarks, that there is not anything objectionable in the resolutions themselves, nor that they came from the wrong quarter, as he supposed.

Now, what are the resolutions? They contain a faithful recital of what has been done by the Congress of the United States, with the view of producing a general pacification on certain subjects throughout the United States; and it is an avowal that certain misguided persons within the States, have taken upon themselves to declare that those laws—particularly the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves—are hostile to the principles of the Constitution, and a violation of the laws, both of God and man, and that all persons who aid in their execution, or advise allegiance to them, are traitors to God and to humanity. These are the resolutions and outgivings that have been given to the four winds of heaven. These are the kind of resolutions that have been reported back from the South, as the common public sentiment of the State of Indiana. This, Mr. President, is a matter of history—no dispute about it whatever. The gentleman must know it. Now for what consideration is he willing that the State of Indiana shall be so understood and represented abroad,—he approving of these acts as he does, though, as he says, not in all the details of some of them—with what propriety, I say, can he stand here and say, "I am not willing to give a contradiction to these resolutions, which I have seen reported in the newspapers, as representing the feelings of the State of Indiana, in reference to these laws—resolutions which have gone to the South, and been reported back through the States, as the orthodox sentiments of our people." Sir, he cannot intend such a blight to come over the State of Indiana, if he thinks that those measures which were passed by Congress, during its last session, were good. No, sir; there is something else about this matter; and it is nothing appertaining either to whiggery or democracy; but it is to leave the question open; it is because a certain portion of politicians in the State of Indiana have taken a position to stand by the laws and see them administered, that other men want to make political capital by taking a doubtful position. Then, sir, I am for bringing every gentleman up. It is quite proper that the Convention should express an opinion; and in doing so, they do not express their opinion as a Convention, acting for the revision of the Constitution, but merely as members of this body, coming from every county in the State, and professing to know the public sentiment on the subject. And they will say "we speak advisedly;" and we do speak advisedly. And, for myself, I fully believe that the public sentiment of the people of the State of Indiana, is, that these measures were brought about by generous and magnanimous concessions from all quarters, and that they had no other object in view than the general restoration of harmony with the sister States; and they believe that if these laws were carried into effect in good faith, they will produce that result. I believe that we speak advisedly of the sentiments of the people of the State of Indiana on the subject.

And, Mr. President, let me say that one reason why I introduced these resolutions, is, that I see in the county which I represent, meetings have been held and resolutions of the most offensive character adopted, in which the people holding the meeting, declare—particularly in reference to the fugitive slave law, that it is hostile and antagonistic to the Constitution of the United States; that it is opposed to every principle of humanity, and that all those persons who aided and contributed to its passage, or who advise its execution, are traitors to God and humanity; and they conclude with a resolution advising violent resistance to its administration. Yes, sir, and these very resolutions have been quoted back from the newspapers, as the public sentiment of the State of Indiana. Sir, I am not willing, whether whig or democrat—and these are names that ought never to be mentioned when a subject of this sort is on the tapis—I am not willing, I say, that such resolutions should be reported as the public feeling of our State, and, if the gentleman from Tippecanoe wishes to propose the course he has advised, he may do so; but he must not profess to me or to anybody else, that he does not believe the question of domestic slavery was the cause of the irritation spoken of in these resolutions. He cannot be so insensible to the events passing before him, as to doubt that the question of slavery and its extension had everything to do with all the questions embraced in what was called the “omnibus bill.” Nobody can doubt it. Whether it was right or wrong that it should have been involved in these questions, is a matter which I cannot now discuss; but it certainly was involved in it, and that is the reason I have mentioned it in the preamble to these resolutions. Now, if gentlemen think that this should be an open question, and that the community should be encouraged, from the idea that it is popular to make an open resistance to this law, let it be so; I can only regret it, while at the same time I must express my willingness to do my duty on this and on all other occasions, in sustaining the law. Admitting that this is a constitutional law, why will the gentleman from Tippecanoe stand idly by and forbid me and every other gentleman, coming from every county in the State, from giving it forth to the world, that it is the public sentiment of Indiana that the law is constitutional; that it was originated and passed in a spirit of compromise and concession; that the object of it was to restore harmony and good feeling among the sister states,—and that it will result in that end, if it be lived up to, I have no doubt.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) resorts to the old fable of a cat in the meal tub, or a snake in the grass, to scare his friends into his views. All that I can say is that he is mighty suspicious. I can tell him, however, that I have never palmed anything of the kind off upon him in my life, and I apprehend that is not what he fears. True, I might be ignorantly led into it. But there is no ground for his suspicion here. The thing is drawn up in as clear English language as I am capable of using. The sentiments contained in the preamble and resolutions, are by no means dubious or uncertain. It is just that kind of sentiment, straight up and down, which every man who wishes the world to know the ground he stands upon, would wish to see expressed.

Mr. NILES. It is not my purpose to occupy one moment of the time of the Convention in speaking of the character of the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Wayne. I have not read them, and I hardly took the trouble to listen to them when they were read by the Clerk. They may, as was alleged by the gentleman, be written in simple and pure English, and they may also contain very simple truths, or they may not. I know not that they do, neither do I care. Sir, for what purpose are we assembled in this Hall? [A voice—“That’s the question.”] Are we not assembled here, an hundred and fifty men, as a Constitutional Convention, for one specific purpose, and that an all-important purpose? And, sir, is it not a well known fact that we are not permitted the necessary time even for deliberate discussion of the most vitally important measures upon which we are called to act? And would the gentleman from Wayne come here and throw upon us a series of resolutions upon which we have no right to act, which must lead to lengthy debate—which will be like a fire-brand in this Hall—and upon which our opinions are worth no more than the opinions of any other one hundred and fifty men within the limits of the State?

Sir, I voted to lay the resolutions on the table, and I shall vote to keep them there. But, sir, I protest that such a vote and such action on my part shall never be construed by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) as indicating hostility to the union of these States. Sir, it shall not be inferred from such action that I am ready to tear down the pillars of this confederacy, or to revel among the broken, and severed, and bleeding fragments of our Union. [Applause.] Sir, I protest again, that because I voted to lay these resolutions on the table, and because I shall vote to keep them there, no such inference shall be drawn; and I say it here now, that because of that vote, neither that gentleman nor any other, shall infer that I hold to any “higher law,” so far as that phrase is understood to mean my own caprice, than obedience to the law of the land in which I live. [Great applause.] No man, sir, shall be allowed to infer from that vote that I am ready to resist the laws; or to bid them defiance.

The gentleman from Wayne complains that certain misguided citizens, as he deems them, and as, indeed, they may be, residing in his own county, have got up a meeting and passed resolutions which he deems unsound and dangerous. Well, sir, all I have to say to that is, that if he thinks so, let him go back to his own county and call another meeting, and elicit the true and wholesome sentiments of the county of Wayne. [Loud cries of "consent."] Or, sir, if the gentleman deems that the integrity of this Union does depend not upon the deep-seated affections of the people of these States for those institutions which have been transmitted to us from our fathers, upon which our happiness and prosperity so largely this day depend—if he deems that the preservation of these institutions depends essentially upon any momentary expression of opinion offered by any body of an hundred and fifty men, let him call a meeting of the people in this town. There are, today, more than a hundred and fifty men in this town from distant portions of the State, who are as competent to express an intelligent opinion on any such subject as we are who are in this Hall. Let him call such a meeting if he chooses, but not obtrude upon this Convention matters which are as foreign to the province of its duties as questions regarding the tariff, or international intercourse, or any other question of national legislation.

And, sir, more than this: I protest that an opinion should never be sent out upon the wings of the wind that our attachment to the Union of these States is so slender, so doubtful, so divided, that it is necessary for us, in order to maintain our fidelity, to be engaged in making such protestations. [Great applause.] Such protestations on the part of the people of Indiana are not necessary, and they never will be necessary. [Applause.] * Sir, it never has been in the power of demagogues in or out of Congress to dissolve this Union. All their gasconade upon the subject is only like "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Such action as is proposed in this Convention only ministers to an excitement which would die of itself. The people of this State will cling to this Union, they will abide by the compromises of the Constitution; they will submit to the laws of the land; there is no more law-abiding people upon earth, and there is no need of the adoption of resolutions of any kind to convince not only the people of the North, but South Carolina herself, that such is our purpose. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. KILGORE. I most cordially concur in the sentiments of the gentleman who has last taken his seat, (Mr. Niles,) when he says that these resolutions ought never to have been introduced here.

Mr. RARIDEN (interposing). That is your opinion.

Mr. KILGORE. In my opinion, with all due deference, nevertheless, to the opinion of the gentleman from Wayne. But, sir, they are here, and "in my opinion" [a laugh] they have been placed by the Convention where they ought to be allowed to remain. ["Hear, hear."] I should have been proud if my experienced friend from Wayne had given us, in detail, the great advantages derived to these States from what are commonly denominated the compromise measures. When we speak of a "compromise" we understand that there are mutual concessions on both sides; and I should be glad to hear the gentleman from Wayne explain to this Convention, in support of the motion to reconsider the vote, what, in this "compromise," has been given up on the part of the South. In this great compromise question, or batch of questions, I would like to know what the South has surrendered? As was correctly remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) in the question of the admission of California there was nothing compromised on the side of either party. It was a stubborn determination on the part of Congress to abstain from acting directly on that question when first presented—a determined resistance to the admission of California as she ought to have been admitted under the Constitution of the United States, without keeping her in a state of delay and uncertainty for nine long months. Was there any surrender of principle or of interest on the part of the South when she was admitted? I say I would like to know what the South surrendered? No change whatever was made in her original Constitution. She was admitted upon the same terms and principles as those on which she originally applied for admission. There was, therefore, no surrender here of anything on the part of the State—nothing, sir, except a disobliging delay to the State of California herself in resisting her admission into the Union.

Then, sir, let the gentleman from Wayne tell me again in relation to the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, what the South surrendered there. This was a question on which the majority of the Senators and Representatives of the United States had a right to act; and they did act upon it, and that decisively. But I would like to know where were the concessions of the South so far as that question was concerned?

Then again, in relation to the Texas boundary question, I would like to know what the South surrendered in regard to that. Why, sir, is it not a notorious fact, that everything was yielded up on the part of the North, and that the government of the United States gave to Texas seventy thousand square miles of territory, in exchange for sixty thousand square miles, to which Texas had no right to carry slaves! Thus they got ten thousand square miles more of territory than they owned, and ten millions of dollars into the bargain, the major portion of which is contributed by the Northern States. That was a "compromise," sir—a great "compromise." There was much yielding on the part of the South there, sir—a great amount of "concession" in that. No, sir. The South has yielded nothing, and got everything—everything has been done in favor of the South; and to talk about "compromise" between the North and the South, is to talk nonsense—absolute foolishness.

Then, sir, in regard to the territorial bills for Utah and New Mexico. I would like to know from gentlemen here, of all parties, both whig and democrat, who surrendered principle in regard to these bills? Was it the South or the North? Each party in the free States, both whig and democrat, were in favor of carrying into the territorial organization the principle of the Wilmot Proviso. They abandoned that principle on the floor of Congress for the gratification of the South. The North yielded everything. There was no consideration given to the North for this; and the territorial bills, like the other measures, passed without any concession on the part of the South. The compromise upon that question was all upon the part of the North. And yet these are the great peace measures, according to the position of the gentleman from Wayne, adopted for the purpose of securing harmony and insuring the peace of the country.

Sir, the course of the South in regard to these measures is the course which she has universally pursued. Whenever they desire to obtain the repeal of an unpopular measure, or to carry a favorite one, they raise the cry of "nullification" and "disunion." What do they propose? Have they compromised any principle? Have they yielded a single thing to the North? No, sir. They demand that the compromises should all be made in favor of the South; and if that is not done, then "nullification and disunion" are their watchwords; and we have been in the habit of yielding to their dictation; and then, when we have done so, we receive from them the courteous appellation of "Northern doughfaces." Then, sir, when we talk about these measures as a great compromise—as measures of mutual concession—we talk nonsense; for the concession is all on one side, and the two great parties, so far as the Wilmot Proviso was concerned, gave up everything, while nothing whatever was given up on the part of the South.

Well then, sir, I come to the fugitive slave bill; and I should like to know what the South has yielded there? She has now got a fugitive slave bill a hundred per cent. stronger than ever she had at any other period of the government—a law that makes the certificate of a commissioner or a county justice of the peace conclusive evidence, not only here, but elsewhere. It is said by some gentlemen that this bill does not suspend the writ of habeas corpus. It does not do so in so many words; but when that writ issues, it is only necessary to return the certificate of the commissioner or justice of the peace, and that stops every proceeding; it is a sufficient answer; for, in the language of the bill itself, it is conclusive, and shall be conclusive to all courts on that question. But let us examine it a little more. It is conclusive so far as the rights of the master are concerned; but is it conclusive in favor of the slave? No, sir; even if a suspected slave should be discharged by one commissioner, the claimant can have an examination before another. Yes, he may have five or six examinations if he pleases; and thus, while this certificate is conclusive in favor of the master, as to his right to the slave, the discharge of the slave, upon a proper trial and legal hearing, is no bar to subsequent proceedings against him, by the real or pretended master; it is not conclusive as to the unfortunate negro's right to freedom. Not only is the law much stronger in this respect than any heretofore passed, but a largely increased penalty has been denounced against those who aid in the escape of a slave. By the law of '93, the penalty was five hundred dollars for aiding in the escape of a slave. This law makes it a criminal offense, subject to an imprisonment for six months, and a fine of one thousand dollars. Thus, sir, a man by this law is not only made a criminal for doing that which his conscience tells him, according to the law of God, he should do; but the old penalty is increased from five hundred to one thousand dollars. Thus you see that everything has been surrendered in favor of the South—everything surrendered on the part of the North in this matter of compromise. Truly, this is a great compromise!

But the gentleman said that these measures were all necessary to save the Union. If the declaration of the Southern gentleman is evidence that this Union is to be dissolved, my word for it, five years of our existence will not pass over before we have the tocsin of alarm sounded from the South that the Union is in danger. Now, sir, we know that they have been trying to hold meetings in the South, and have made a great noise about "disunion;" but now, after all, what is the result of all their meetings? Why, to use a common expression, they have "fizzled out." [A laugh.] And, sir, it will be just so with that class of meetings referred to by the gentleman from Wayne as having been held in his own county. This meeting passed resolutions denouncing the fugitive slave law. I do not know what the feeling of that county may be. But, at all events, these resolutions may be simply the expression of the opinions of a minority; and if that be so, why, then, let it go to the world for just so much as it is worth. Where, sir, is this great Union meeting which we saw advertised to take place in Indianapolis some five or six weeks ago? Why not let the people come here and freely express their opinions with regard to these compromise measures, if they wish it? But it is well known to every gentleman here that these compromise measures were never discussed before the people when the question was taken as to calling this Convention; and I will venture the assertion, that there is not a single gentleman who rode into this Convention as a passenger in that Omnibus. And yet, sir, we are asked to travel beyond our legitimate sphere, and pass resolutions approving of everything contained in these measures.

Now, if the motion to re-consider should prevail, and this preamble and resolution should be adopted, I should like to learn from the gentleman from Wayne in what part of the new Constitution he designs that they should have a place? Will he affix them to the end of the Constitution, in the shape of an appendix? I, for one, shall be decidedly in favor of affixing them to the Constitution, and as a last clause, to have the yeas and nays—every man's name there for and against them, [applause,] that it may go down to posterity as a memento of the folly of those who preceded them. ["Consent" and applause.] It is suggested to me by a friend who sits near me, that we might likewise add "the song of Moses." [Laughter.] Well, perhaps that also might be appropriate as an appendix to the Constitution. It is certainly just as appropriate to introduce the song of Moses into our new Constitution, or even into this Convention, as it is to introduce the preamble and resolutions offered here by the gentleman from Wayne. I regret to be under the necessity of differing with the gentleman. We have been fighting together in this good cause for a great many years; but if he is resolved to part association and go off with a new party, I cannot help it. This union party will unquestionably embrace all parties, and it may be possible that the gentleman from Wayne may become the leader of that party, and that he may, for once in his life, be in the majority. [Laughter.] If he should become the leader he certainly will be in the majority if it be a great ruling principle that the majority will forever be in the ascendancy, for if the abstract question of union or disunion were placed before the people of Indiana to-morrow, I venture the assertion that five hundred people in the State could not be found who would say that they were favorable to disunion. Nay, more, sir. I will still further venture to say, that of those persons who have examined those measures which were discussed in Congress during the last session, there are not five hundred sane men in the State of Indiana who have ever entertained any fears of dissolution. [Cries of "no, no."] It is all gammon, sir. Political men may talk about it as they please; but let the question of union or disunion be put to the masses of the South—even if every bill in Mr. Clay's omnibus had broken down—and you would find that four out of every five of the entire population of the Southern States would be in favor of the Union to the last. That is the opinion I have always entertained. Why, sir, how was it in Congress, when all these exciting speeches were made? Why, sir, as a general thing, there were not more than thirty members in their seats listening to these inflammatory speeches from Southern gentlemen who were all the time holding out before the country the terror of "disunion" and "dissolution." Why, sir, if there had been half as much danger to the Union as one might have supposed from reading these speeches at home, there can be no doubt that they would have been listened to in the Halls of Congress with the most lively attention. No man would have left his post, when questions of such vital importance to the interests of the country were being discussed.

Now, sir, we have reached the hour of adjournment, and perhaps I may be allowed to say that we have occupied quite as much time as we ought to do in discussing a matter so entirely irrelevant to all the purposes for which we were sent here. I hope, therefore, that the vote may not be re-considered. Those who voted for laying the preamble and resolutions on the table, I have no doubt intended that they should remain there. I rose in my place for the purpose of making a motion that they should be laid upon the table, but the gentleman from Wayne gave notice that he would recall the previous question. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) opposed it, and the resolutions now lie upon the table, and I hope that they may be allowed to lie there, and that we may proceed to take up the business which legitimately belongs to us, and try in the most expeditious manner to re-model the Constitution and go home to our constituents. If we have any fear of the perpetuity of the Union in consequence of the resolutions which have been passed at the meeting in Wayne county, let us call mass meetings and repudiate these Wayne resolutions.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. This is not the proper place to discuss the merits of the Fugitive Slave Law, the admission of California, nor the Texas Boundary Question. Our convening in this Hall was for a far different purpose. And, sir, in my humble opinion, we can more certainly show our attachment to the Union by attending to the business we have been sent here to perform. I have never yet moved the previous question, and dislike to do so, but for the purpose of cutting off useless debate which can result in no good, I would be pleased to see the previous question sustained at this time.

Pending the question on the motion to re-consider,

On motion by Mr. PETTIT,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT. The business pending at the time of adjournment this morning was a call for the previous question, made by the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper) on the motion to re-consider.

Mr. KENT. Before we proceed to the transaction of any business we should have a majority at least of the members in their seats. I move, therefore, a call of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to; and the roll having been called through by the Secretary—

Mr. BORDEN moved to dispense with the further call of the Convention, and the call was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the call of the gentleman from Crawford for the previous question.

Mr. PEPPER, by request, withdrew his motion.

[Mr. WALPOLE here took the floor and spoke at some length in support of the resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). His speech is now under revision, and will be published hereafter.]

Mr. BASCOM. I desire to say a few words in regard to my position on this question. I presume, sir, that however loudly and dictatorial gentlemen may choose to speak, no member here will be driven or forced into a wilful transgression of duty. I am opposed to the question being argued here on Union ground, for I do not believe that there is a man in Indiana in favor of disunion. What, sir, is the use of calling Union meetings and keeping up agitation and excitement, and talking about the dissolution of the Union? Who fears dissolution? who cries dissolution? No one, sir; but broken down politicians, such as the one who introduced the resolutions now under consideration.

I am opposed, sir, to occupying the attention of the Convention by reading extracts from the newspapers of the day; but then as there seems to be a fitness in connection with the present subject in reading a short extract from a newspaper in my possession, I will do so. This paper, sir, is published in the county from which the gentleman from Wayne hails. It purports to be from a Centreville correspondent:

"As Mr. RARIDEN is the oldest, I will place him first on the list. He is endeavoring to manufacture capital for himself by mounting the hobby of opposition to negroes and advocating their extermination. By catering to the prejudices against that unfortunate class he obtained a seat in the Convention, and he hopes to be equally successful in getting a seat in Congress on the same ground. Hence his course in the Convention, in speaking in favor of negro prohibition and in favor of the fugitive law. He is bidding high to get to be the administration candidate for Congress, and I should not wonder if he would succeed, for he has taken bolder ground than any of the other aspirants."

Mr. RARIDEN. What paper is that?

Mr. BASCOM. It is the "Jeffersonian," dated November 18, 1850.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). I suppose the gentleman wrote the article himself.

Mr. BASCOM. What did the gentleman remark?

Mr. RARIDEN. I would ask the gentleman if he is not in the habit of writing articles in which my name is used?

Mr. BASCOM. Not to answer the gentleman in an abrupt manner, I would say that it is none of his business. I shall write for whatever paper I may see fit.

A portion of the preamble I consider false so far as I am concerned.

Now, sir, this preamble is not a fair one. I do not know what the sentiment of the people in my county is upon the subject. When I left home they did not know of the passage of the fugitive slave law. From what I know, sir, I believe my people are opposed to the law; and yet the members of this Convention are requested to endorse it, although their constituents may be opposed to it.

Not only that, sir, but these resolutions are out of place in this Convention. We have assembled here not to pass slavery resolutions, or resolutions affirming the acts of Congress, but simply to revise and amend our old Constitution. If the people are satisfied with the action of their representatives let them say so to them personally or by mass meetings. Let them not call upon us to call Union meetings and pass resolutions endorsing their action.

If the Delegate has got into a squabble with his constituents on the subject—if there are disunion men in his county that he wants to put down—let him go home and adjust the matter.

He should not rise in this body, sir, and ask one hundred and forty odd men, residing out of his county, in other parts of the State, to pass resolutions for his benefit to support him against a portion of his constituents. If these resolutions are passed the gentleman from Wayne can go home with them and say that the Constitutional Convention, assembled in the Capitol of the State, has sustained him in the position he has taken on the subject mooted in his resolutions.

I am as willing, sir, to stand by the Union as any other man. My people are entirely in favor of the Union. I do not, sir, believe in Union meetings, for I have no fears of disunion. It is nothing but some political tricksters who are trying to raise an excitement amongst the people.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Such political tricksters as Clay, Webster, and Benton.

Mr. BASCOM. I am talking about the Constitutional Convention of Indiana, and not of our Congressmen. I look upon all these attempts to create dissension, sir, with contempt, and their authors cannot fail to receive the just indignation of the people. I hope, sir, that the Convention will not re-consider the motion that laid these resolutions on the table; if they do, sir, I shall offer an amendment to strike them out entirely.

Mr. OWEN. This morning, sir, the resolutions before us, covering three pages of foolscap, were introduced by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). I was not so fortunate as the gentleman from Wells, who had previously seen them in print. I but heard them read hastily at the Secretary's desk, and was called on, under the previous question, without opportunity to examine or time to consider them, to vote for their acceptance or rejection. Thus urged to instant decision, I voted to lay them on the table; and under the same circumstances, I should repeat, twenty times, the same vote.

I say this, not that I do not approve the general tenor of the resolutions; but because no series of resolutions, containing so many words, involving so many propositions, on a subject so important as this before us, ought to be thus urged to a vote here, without a single chance afforded to utter a syllable, or to offer an amendment. This is not the proper manner to obtain the calm, deliberate judgment of this Convention, on questions which, for a twelve month past, have convulsed the Union.

I had yet another reason for the vote to lay on the table. I doubted whether the resolutions could be received, discussed, and passed upon here, without stirring up hard feelings, and giving birth to sectional heart-burnings. The result has justified my expectation. Indiana, like the Union of which she forms a part, has her North and her South; and popular sentiment on the subject matter of these resolutions, is very different in one of these sections from what it is in the other.

But now things are changed. On a motion to re-consider the vote to lay on the table, debate has arisen, and speeches have been made—especially by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore)—which, if we refrain from acting in this matter, must create false inferences. It has been urged that we should frown down these resolutions, because they sanction a series of acts passed last summer by Congress, which are, in fact, but a tissue of injustice to the North, and which ought, therefore, to be condemned and denounced. That is not my opinion; nor, very certainly, is it the opinion of more than a small minority of this Convention. And we ought not to suffer so false an inference to go abroad, a fire-brand cast forth amidst the inflammable matter which the recent action of our National Legislature has smothered only, not wholly extinguished. We must not, by our action or by our silence, supply texts to fanatics, Northern or Southern, in their preachings against the Union, or in their efforts to dissolve it.

It is nothing to me, sir, whatever it may be to others, whence these resolutions came, whether from a whig or a democratic source. I can say, with perfect sincerity, that, as to one-half, at least, of my fellow-delegates here, I have forgotten or never knew, to which political party they belong. Some there are who take good care we shall not forget it. Among them are the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) and the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole).

Mr. WALPOLE, As one of the gentlemen alluded to by the gentleman from Posey, I would say, that any reference that I have made to the action of political parties was made because of provocation given by that gentleman in his speeches. As for instance, the one in regard to internal improvements, the other day.

Mr. OWEN. I gave no such provocation, as the Convention well knows. In adverting to the action in 1835-6 as to internal improvement, I referred not directly or indirectly to party; and spoke of it solely in proof that the people may, for a time, approve and endorse a law of such a character, that it has led half way to ruin and bankruptcy.

Mr. WALPOLE. I challenge the gentleman from Posey to name one only of the multiplied cases in which I have attacked his party without provocation.

Mr. OWEN. Has the gentleman already forgotten—the Convention at all events has not—his recent denunciation of democrats and democratic leaders, as distrusters of the people, as men who set themselves up as “thinking machines” for their fellow-citizens? And all merely because we did not think it necessary or wise to leave an open clause in the Constitution, submitting the question of an increase of the public debt, to the people.

I had yet another reason, sir, for voting to lay the resolution on the table. They do not suit me in their present form, with their present wording.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). Ah! now it comes out.

Mr. OWEN. I suppose that when a proposition is submitted to us here, whether it be a series of resolutions or a section of the new Constitution, it is our privilege, if we do not like it as it stands, to state our objections, and move to amend.

Mr. WALPOLE here rose to interrupt Mr. Owen, but was declared out of order by the Chair.

Mr. OWEN. It has seldom been my fortune to attempt a reply to anything that has fallen from the gentleman from Hancock, without being interrupted by him some half dozen times. He calculates, perhaps, the difficulty of preserving the connection of an argument, if in the course of it, the thread be continually broken.

There are two things which, in my judgment, as the question now stands, we ought to do. The one is to declare in a general way, our approval of the series of Acts, usually called the compromise measures, passed by Congress during its last session. The other is, to assert, in terms the most unequivocal, that it is the duty of every good citizen to obey the law, whether he approve its provisions, or not. Let us do these two things in the briefest and plainest language; and that is all we need do.

As to the details of these various measures, I doubt whether half the delegates on this floor, have ever read them through; at all events with a view to scrutinize the several provisions of each. In these detailed particulars, then, it would be unreasonable to ask this body to pass judgment for or against them. And as regards one of them—the fugitive slave law—many of its provisions has yet to receive a construction from the courts; and we may well be excused if we scruple to endorse its details, since neither of our Senators voted for or against it.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). They dodged the question.

Mr. OWEN. There may be some vindication. I do not know the circumstances that caused their absence from the Senate Chamber at that time.

For myself, I say frankly, that, there are some of the details of that law which I cannot approve. Had I been a member of Congress at its last session, I should have resisted these, by every legitimate means—by offering amendments or otherwise—to the very last. But if, finally, when all attempts to modify had proved unavailing, the passage of the bill had become necessary as the sole means of calming the wide-spread and pestiferous agitation which pervaded the land, I should have cast my vote for it, faulty as I conceive it to be.

The opinions of the Convention on these matters should be expressed, I think, as briefly as possible. To this end I have prepared a preamble and resolutions not more than one-fourth as long, I think, as those offered by the gentleman from Wayne, which I propose, at the proper time, to offer as a substitute; and which I will now ask to have read by the Secretary.

The preamble and resolutions were read by the Secretary, as follows:

WHEREAS, the Congress of the United States, passed at its last session, a series of Acts, commonly called the compromise measures and including the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves; and

WHEREAS, certain misguided individuals in this and other free States, have expressed their determination to resist said fugitive slave law; Therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, the common sentiment of the people of Indiana sustains and endorses, in their general features and intention, the said series of compromise measures passed by Congress, and recognizes in the success of these measures, an earnest of security and perpetuity to our glorious Union.

Resolved, That whatever may be the opinions of individuals as to the wisdom or policy of any of the details of the fugitive slave law, it is the duty of all good citizens to conform to its requisitions, and to carry out, in good faith, the conditions of that compromise on the subject of domestic slavery, which is coeval with the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be transmitted to the Governors of each State and Territory in the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. RARIDEN. If it will shorten debate, and harmonize the action of the Convention upon this subject, I will accept of the resolutions of the gentleman from Posey, as a substitute for those I have presented.

Mr. OWEN. The general tenor of my resolutions is similar to that of the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Wayne. One or two of the expressions, even, I have retained.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to make a few remarks, Mr. President, merely to place myself right upon this great Union question. I think, sir, this is a question which, above all others, merits, as it should receive, the action of this Convention. When we see sir, that the Congress of the United States, for the last six months, have been constantly occupied in trying to settle and harmonize the differences that have existed between the South and the North, and have succeeded in adopting a series of compromise measures, why should we not come forward, as representatives of the people of Indiana, and endorse in a public manner the propriety, and the correctness, and the justice of the settlement they have made of questions that have so long distracted and divided this nation. I must confess, sir, that I have been considerably surprised in hearing gentlemen very nearly my equal in age, and much in advance of me in talents and experience—getting up and expressing their amazement and regret that such resolutions as those now under consideration should be introduced into this body. I confess my surprise, that gentlemen assert that this is not the proper time nor occasion, for sending forth such an expression of our sentiments, as the adoption of these resolutions would present to the world. This conduct, sir, is the more strange because there never has been a period in our history, as a republic, when it becomes the friends of this glorious Union, to stand up more earnestly in its support. A feeling has been in existence for a number of years favorable to the disunion of this confederacy; and no man can shut his eyes to the dissensions that have been created by that portion of the people entertaining those opinions, and which are, even now, sapping the very foundation of our Republic. And yet gentlemen get up here and say there is no necessity of acting upon the question—there is no fear of a dissolution of the Union.

I think, sir, some of the remarks of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) were exactly in point, particularly where he alluded to the evasion of duty, so often the characteristic of public men. If there is any one thing more than another that I dislike, it is to see time-serving, truckling, politicians, afraid to come out and give an expression of their opinion in regard to public questions, although those questions may be of the utmost importance, and involve the very existence of this Government. It is too often the case, sir, that men, who set themselves up for party leaders, avoid all action upon questions of importance, until they discover which side meets with public favor; and when they have discovered what is the public will, and the popular feeling, then, and then only, do they make their views known. I utterly despise such politicians, and I earnestly hope there are none of that character here. The vote proposed to be taken upon these resolutions, or some amended proposition, will bring the question properly before this Convention, and we shall know the views of members in regard to this matter. Gentlemen cannot get rid of their responsibility, or evade the question, by rising in their places, and declaiming of the impropriety of the introduction of these resolutions, or by any other subterfuge.

Gentlemen tell you that there is no danger of disunion. Why, sir, not only are political parties divided upon the question, but the religious denominations of our country are also divided. Three of the strongest and most powerful of the religious organizations of the nation are divided upon the great question of slavery. Why was it, sir, that the Methodist Episcopal Church met at Baltimore in conference, and divided the northern and the southern portions of it upon the slavery question, if there was no agitation in regard to it? Had they not the same political and social ties binding them to this Union that we have? Was not their religious fidelity to their church more binding than any mere political or party ties? And yet they met in conference and determined to divide their churches, and set their ministers off, some in the South and some in the North, to promulgate different religious views upon the subject of slavery. Such also has been the action of the Baptist Church; and the Presbyterians are even now on the point of taking the same course. In view of these things can it be said, there is no danger to this beloved Union. I feel, sir, there is great danger of this Union; and it is my deliberate judgment if it is ever dissolved, upon any question, it will be upon the slavery question. It is evident then, sir, that this is not a matter of such small importance as gentlemen seem to flatter themselves it is. The question is now before the Convention, and how are we to get it out? As the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has remarked, how can we get rid of this question, when it is now before us, by moving to lay it upon the table, or by smothering it down in some other way, without giving cause for false impressions abroad as to our conduct in the premises. The question is whether the members of this Convention have the nerve and the determination of purpose to assert that they will carry out and sustain the compromises that lately passed Congress, and under all circumstances, give them their support, while they are the law of the land. All that is necessary, sir, for us to do is to acknowledge the principle contained in those measures, and this can be done in a few brief resolutions. The principles contained in the fugitive slave bill, that of surrendering the fugitive from labor, to his master, who may pursue and claim him, is a principle guarantied by the Constitution of the United States, and one that we should seek to carry out in good faith.

For one, sir, I am determined to give my vote for any set of resolutions that will combine all these objects. I have not had the pleasure of hearing the resolutions, offered by the gentleman from Wayne, read, that are now lying upon the table. I may prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Posey. I think it is probable that I shall, as the series he proposes are more brief and to the point, I understand, than those offered by the gentleman from Wayne. It is our duty, under the Constitution, to carry out such laws as may be passed by Congress. There can be no truckling or evasion on this point. Gentlemen may endeavor to evade their Constitutional duty, but the country will hold them responsible for such action. I do trust, sir, that we will take up these resolutions from the table, and if it be necessary, that we amend them in such manner, as that they shall suit every member of this Convention when we come to vote directly upon the subject, and ascertain whether there is any one desirous of repudiating the late action of Congress, or of not carrying into effect the measures of conciliation and compromise, which they adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY. I am one of those, sir, who voted to lay these resolutions on the table, and that too without fear of being called a disunionist, as one not in favor of preserving this Union. I voted to lay them on the table, sir, because I believed this was not the place nor the occasion for their introduction. I ask the members of this Convention, for what have they assembled here? For what did the people send us here? Did they send us here to discuss resolutions, declaring whether or not this Union shall be dissolved—whether slavery is right or not? Whether the North or the South are acting correctly or not? No, sir. They sent us here to alter, revise, and amend the organic law of the State. We are here, sir, for that purpose to-day. We are not here to consume the time of this Convention and wasting the means of the people in discussing measures which have been decided in Congress, and which have become the fixed laws of the land. And, sir, I will not permit any gentleman because I take this position, to call me a disunionist. Because, sir, every one who is acquainted with my political action, knows very well that I am no disunionist. If gentlemen apprehend a dissolution of the Union, why do they not return to their constituents and get up Union meetings. In their meetings, they can present resolutions sustaining the action of Congress, and have them passed without interfering with the public business of the State.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) appears to have become very patriotic all at once, and comes out a most determined champion of the Union. If that gentleman has always been so much in favor of Union, why did he not jump upon the democratic platform in 1848 and assist in electing General Cass to the Presidency, whose election would have prevented all this agitation and difficulty. [Applause and cries of "consent, consent."]

As has been well remarked by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) this matter has assumed a serious aspect, and we are bound to vote upon this question now it is before us, and after what has been said in regard to it—otherwise it will appear as if we desired to avoid the issue. If the gentleman from Wayne was so desirous of having an expression of the sentiment of the people of Indiana on this question, why did he not wait a few weeks, until the representatives of the people had assembled here? He would have then heard a voice from the people of Indiana that could not have been misunderstood, for I am well assured that those who have taken a prominent part in bringing about the adoption of these compromise measures will be sustained by the people of Indiana.

Gentlemen talk about the danger of dissolution, but I affirm, sir, it cannot be dissolved; it is too firmly seated in the hearts of the American people. Politicians might dissolve it if they could for the purpose of elevating themselves, but the people would never consent to it. I shall vote for the re-consideration, sir. I am bound to do it although, at the same time, I believe these resolutions were unnecessarily and inappropriately brought in. We have spent already about six hundred dollars of the people's money over the question, and I say let the blame rest upon him who introduced it.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Consent, consent! and those who voted against it.

Mr. KELSO. I should not trouble the Convention now if it was not for the fact that if the motion which laid these resolutions on the table is re-considered, it will bring us back to where we started; and the previous question having been called, I will be deprived of the privilege of expressing my sentiments in regard to the matter, and having a little to say on this question, I will take advantage of the present motion to re-consider to say what I desire to say. Gentlemen may call me time-serving, or anything else they please, but it will not change my position, nor deter me from saying what I consider to be right. What I have to say, sir, upon any question will always be uttered without fear of favor or reproach.

Now, sir, I am directly opposed to the proposition upon the table, and also to the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) because I do not think that such propositions should be entertained by this body. I care not where these propositions come from, or how short and pointed they may be, I am utterly opposed to their being entertained by this body. I maintain, sir, a vote upon these resolutions will be but an expression of our opinion in regard to the great question of slavery or anti-slavery—no more, nothing more, nor nothing less, than this subject; and its introduction here is just about as appropriate as the question of the tariff or the correctness of the privilege of taxing foreign merchandise for the protection of home industry, and I presume no gentleman on this floor will contend seriously that that is a fit subject for our consideration. The question simply is whether this Convention will send forth to our constituents our approbation or disapprobation of the fugitive slave bill. That, sir, is the real bone of contention. I have to say, sir, in regard to this bill, that taking the law as it stands, all together, if I had had a vote in the Congress of the United States when it was first presented for their action, I should have voted against it.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Would you vote to repeal it now that it is passed?

Mr. KELSO. If gentlemen think that I am afraid to express my sentiments on this or any other subject, they have mistaken the man. I declare, sir, I would vote to repeal it. We had two worthy and talented men in the Senate, or they ought to have been there when the fugitive slave bill passed, but were not. I have conversed with both of these gentlemen since the law passed, in this Capital, and one of them has stated to me that he believed amendments were necessary to that law, and that amendments, this winter, would be made to it. Suppose, sir, that we take up these resolutions from off the table and pass them. Now I ask you if that will be anything more or less than saying to our Senators that we are satisfied with the law as it is—you need not amend it.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the law, and I am not ashamed to avow it here. I say, sir, any law that forces me to become a slave catcher will meet with my condemnation here and elsewhere. I am no abolitionist, sir; neither will I become one until you present to me some good and legitimate place of getting rid of this class of people. At present I will favor no proposition calculated to make their condition worse than it now is. If you turn them loose, give them their freedom, and allow them to live among us, you must allow them to become part and parcel of our community and admit them to all the privileges of citizens, and until you do that by giving them freedom, you put them in a worse condition than they now are. But that, sir, should not be done. Let them remain where they now are until you can make other provisions for them where they can live as freemen indeed; but to live among us on an equality they never can.

I would as soon engage in almost any other unholy business as to engage in the pursuit of runaway negroes, for I look upon such business as I would upon stealing black sheep in a dark night. No one was formerly compelled to do it. And now striking directly at the conservative rights of the people of Indiana and the other free States, the Congress of the United States has passed this law compelling the citizens of this State, through the agency of the United States Marshal, to aid upon the demand of the owner of slaves to catch them, and that officer has the right to compel every citizen of Indiana to become particeps in that business. The Constitution of the United States has always required the delivering up of the fugitive from labor; but under this law there are new and more stringent provisions by which the citizens of the free States are called upon to comply with. Here is a negro in Indiana who has absconded from his master and finds his way here. He gets here and he feels partially secure, as there is no one here to claim him. He is not regarded as property by the laws and Constitution of this State. When he puts his foot upon our soil, so far as our laws are concerned, he is a freeman, and if his master lands him here, knowingly and intentionally the strong presumption would be that he would be a free man indeed, and that his master could not reclaim him. But if the slave comes here of his own accord, without the knowledge or consent of his master, it is certain that he is not a freeman; he can acquire no additional freedom by his own act, so far as the ownership of his master is concerned. As no man here claims to be the owner or can take possession of, and claim, him, and the master alone can do it, why should the citizens here be called upon to take him and deliver him up? No man claims the negro, no man has him in possession, no one is harboring him; he is running at large upon his own hook. I say, sir, in view of that fact no man should be compelled, against his will and against his conscience, to interfere for or against the negro, and it is a bad law. As has been well remarked by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) I desire that that which is bad shall be taken out of the law, and the bare principle of the right of the master to the slave be recognized. No man should be allowed, under heavy penalty, to aid the slave to escape; and in case of resistance to the law, by any but the negro himself, the Marshal should have the right to command the citizen, and not otherwise. You may arrest the slave to-day and take him before the proper officer, and to-night be discharged, and to-morrow you can arrest him on another process, and so arrest him from time to time until the magistrate gives you a certificate whereby the claimant can take possession of the negro.

And such a course must, and inevitably will, produce more or less of excitement in any civilized community. It is a desperate and bitter struggle on the part of the colored man for his rights and his freedom, which is undoubtedly as dear to him as it would be to us. On the other hand the struggle is equally desperate for the ownership, and a valuable acquisition of property in the negro; it is submitted to the judicial administrators of the law, and after full proof and due deliberation the negro is discharged.

Should the claimant still pursue his victim, as if determined to subject him to the shackles of slavery in defiance of law, order, and humanity, would not any community of Christian people feel the full force of such an outrage, and become incensed at it.

And where, I ask, would the fault lie? Not at the doors of the people who became excited at an open attempt to defeat the law by dogging the officers of justice into compliance. Not at the door of the negro, who certainly has an indisputable right to contend for and maintain his rights and freedom, if he can do so by law. Who then, I again ask, is in the fault? None, sir, but he who tramples upon the law and the rights of other men in open defiance of the law.

Well, sir, the moment they have succeeded in producing an excitement the whole burden is thrown upon the shoulders of the United States Marshal and the citizens of your State.

All the claimant has to do is to make an affidavit that he has reason to fear, and does fear, that there will be forcible opposition to the removal of the slave; after that he may stand back and take his ease by leisurely looking on. The Marshal, as a public functionary, is bound to act; he cannot act efficiently alone; he commands the citizens to aid, not only in capturing the negro, but in delivering without the limits of Indiana; and the General Government pays the expense of it. And in case the negro, when so captured, shall escape either with or without the fault of the Marshal, or his deputy, the Marshall pay for the negro; the master himself might aid the slave to make his escape, and thereby compel the Marshal to pay him for the negro which he had aided and induced to escape from the Marshal.

And by these resolutions I am called upon to endorse that fugitive slave law, and virtually say it is now good and sufficient, and needs no amendments. Sir, I will do no such thing.

And, sir, in addition, there is almost a direct bribe offered to the officer to give the certificate to the claimant of the negro; for if he will give the certificate to the owner that the negro is his slave he shall receive ten dollars, whereas, if he declares the negro free he only receives five dollars. Now, sir, is that a just provision in such a law, where the freedom of a human being is at stake? shall there be held out by way of inducement to the officer having the question before, to decide against humanity and freedom an advancement to his own pocket of one hundred per cent? Such a provision, sir, is nothing more or less than a burning disgrace upon those who passed it, and will do much more to harrow up dissension, discord, and even rebellion, than it will ever do toward allaying either.

The question then is shall we say indirectly by the passage of these resolutions that honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress shall not move any amendments to this law—that we are satisfied with it as it now stands. No, sir, never—never.

Mr. President, I have heard many say that they were apprehensive for the perpetuity of the Union. Now, sir, I see no ground for such apprehension. I have no fears of the dissolution of the Union. True, some persons are making a great deal of noise about it, and it is now brought in to occasion agitation and excitement among us: whether to make political capital out of it or not I do not know.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). It was introduced to make gentlemen show their hands.

Mr. KELSO. What seems to be the difficulty. I voted against the resolutions, I voted to lay them on the table, and what can the gentleman do with me about it? What can he do among my people? Why, sir, I can beat him in running for any office from constable up to Congressman among my people, and vote—against these resolutions. [Laughter and applause.] If I was to go into the county of Wayne perhaps he might beat me in running for office, though I am not so sure about that. I say, sir, that every man should act boldly on this subject—should express his sentiments clearly and unequivocally. I think in regard to any subject that has come up for consideration before this body that I can challenge any man to point out the time when I have flinched. I hope I never shall flinch; and, sir, I do not charge this upon the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) by any means. I believe he is a bold and fearless politician, and I think he has boldly introduced a question here which should have been kept out of this body. I do not, as some have suggested, charge any bad motives on him—that he has introduced these resolutions for the purpose of building up a little political capital for himself; but if he even did, it is not by any means criminal; but I do think if he had held them back until nearer the close of our sessions, and not thrown a fire-brand, as it were, among us to consume the time of this body in unprofitable discussions, he would have pursued a better course, and one that would more generally have been approved of.

I have thus spoken my sentiments, sir, fully and freely, not for the sake of influencing any one, but because I deemed it my duty to present the views that I conscientiously entertain and believe, and I am now prepared under all circumstances to vote against the resolutions for two reasons: because they contain matter which I am not prepared to endorse, and because I believe this Convention has no legitimate jurisdiction or control of the subject matter itself.

Mr. NEWMAN. I desire, briefly, Mr. President, to give the reasons which influenced me to vote to lay these resolutions on the table. I differ entirely with gentlemen who believe in the propriety of introducing this subject here, and I gave my vote conscientiously therefore, for the purpose of getting rid of it. I would have been willing to have seen a silent vote taken upon the motion for the previous question, as a motion less calculated to disturb the harmony of this body than any other on the subject. But as the motion was made to lay on the table I voted for it without any feeling of responsibility, as to any principle that was to be decided by that vote contained in the resolutions. I did not think there was any responsibility to be incurred by any gentleman in voting either one way or the other, further than that of occupying the time of the Convention unnecessarily by voting in the negative.

I yield, sir, to no man on this floor in an ardent attachment to this Union; and my colleague, I think, knows me too well to doubt that that attachment is as strong as his. No gentleman ought to feel himself bound to vote either one way or the other upon the question involved in these resolutions, because they have been introduced here. I do not think it necessary either to discuss the principle involved in them.

Ninety-nine out of every hundred persons in this State, are attached to the Union, and no person can alienate that attachment. I do not believe in the dissolution of the Union; it cannot be dissolved. I look upon all clamors concerning it as foolish and absurd—in fact as trivial, and unworthy of the attention bestowed on them. The less dignity you give to the idea by grave discussion of it, the sooner it will die out and be lost in the mists of time. We came here, sir, for the purpose of attending to certain delegated duties. It is a true remark, sir, often made, that if individuals, assembled in the capacity of representatives of the people, were to attend more to the business which they are elected to execute, and less time in endeavoring to create political capital for themselves, in the introduction of subjects calculated to inflame the public mind, the more faithfully their duties would be discharged, and the better the interests of the public service would be subserved.

I do not wish, sir, to discuss the question of the attachment of any portion of the people of this Union to the Constitution of the confederacy of the United States; nor their disposition to yield obedience to those laws of the land which are constitutionally made. Nor am I going to question the constitutional power of Congress to pass such laws as these resolutions now under consideration apply to. So long as they are the laws of the land, good citizens will yield obedience to them; and I do not believe, for one, that, so long as they are in force, the public mind is so prejudiced against them as to prevent their being executed. If such a feeling existed, which I do not believe, I should hold it to be unworthy of law abiding and good citizens.

If there should be a majority of the people opposed to them, it is one of the glorious privileges we enjoy to discuss them freely, and to bring them to the bar of public opinion, and hold them up to the light of day and see if they can stand public scrutiny. There is no call upon us, sir, to pass upon their character, even if, as is said by my friend Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) our action will afford some consolation to southern slaveholders.

Mr. WALPOLE. I spoke of the slave States.

Mr. NEWMAN. Slave States then let it be. We came here, sir, for other objects than to give our opinions pro and con, upon the merits of slavery or the action of slaveholders. Our southern brethren know this well, and they can have no reason for complaint if we confine ourselves within the just limits of our appropriate duties.

My conviction, sir, is that the introduction of these resolutions will have a mischievous tendency, not merely from the fact of its leading to divisions in this Hall, but because it will inflame the public mind out of it; and it is more than probable that more good will result to the cause that they are designed to subserve, by the withdrawal of them from the Convention altogether, than by any action we can take in reference to them. Therefore, Mr. President, it was that because I was opposed to the introduction of exciting questions, that I voted to lay these resolutions upon the table, and I shall vote to retain them there. Whatever other gentlemen may do, I shall take the responsibility of doing what I think to be right.

Mr. BLYTHE. If it had not been for the character of the remarks of the gentleman from Hancock, I should not have deemed it necessary to have said anything upon this subject. I voted to lay these resolutions on the table, because I felt very sure that I was not sent here for the purpose of engaging in the discussion of the principles involved in them. It is distinctly understood among the people I represent, that controversy on political questions forms no part of the legitimate business of this Convention. I came not here to advance the interests of one party in preference to the interests of another. I came not here to assist in laying the foundation of a new party, whether that party is to be called a Union or an anti-Union party; but I came here for the purpose of assisting in framing a Constitution for the benefit of the people. Gentlemen say that the opposition to these resolutions came from a wrong quarter this morning; reference, I suppose, being made to the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore.)

I have only to say, sir, in reference to the charge which has been made against those who were unwilling that these, or any similar resolutions, should be introduced and discussed here, of abolitionism, that for myself, I entertain not the slightest fear that anybody will believe that I am tainted with that doctrine, or any other in the slightest degree approaching to it. What I have heretofore said, and the votes which I have already given upon the subjects of negro suffrage and the principle of negro exclusion from the State, afford evidence enough upon this point. Those subjects were legitimately before the Convention, and I have spoken and acted upon them as I believed my duty required me to speak and act; and upon all other questions which properly come before the Convention, I shall pursue the same course. I do not recognize the right of any man to introduce here a series of resolutions upon any subject which does not form properly a part of the work of this Convention, and tell me that I shall vote for them under pain of being denounced as a "time-serving politician," or as traitorous to my country. Gentlemen may keep such epithets for those who fear them.

Men may persuade me sometimes to do that which is contrary to the dictates of my judgment, but they cannot drive me to do anything. Denunciation cannot force me into the support of a measure which does not meet with my approval. You may denounce if you please; but I choose to do that which I believe to be right—that which duty requires at my hands. I do not choose to put my political conscience in the keeping of any man, or set of men. These being my feelings, I voted to lay these resolutions on the table, and when the question comes up again, I shall vote to keep them there.

But, if the majority of this Convention are determined to have a vote taken upon these resolutions, so as to ascertain who are for and who are against the principle contained in them, then I say, sir, that as far as the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne are concerned, I shall vote against them, because there are expressions contained in them that I cannot sanction. If the question comes up upon the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I say that for that proposition I will vote; but I will not act upon that or any similar proposition, until you compel me by the force of majority to do so. I should vote against the proposition altogether, were it not that I am unwilling to record on the journal of this House a vote which is not in accordance with my opinion.

Mr. WOLFE. I wish to make a single remark in regard to this subject. I did not vote to lay these resolutions on the table, though I would have been glad if they had not been introduced in the Convention but as they had been introduced here, I thought it was not the better way to lay them on the table, as an impression might go out into the world, that we did not wish to act upon them. Inasmuch as they are introduced here, I believe that we should act upon them; and I shall vote for the motion to re-consider, on the same principle.

Mr. KENT. I cordially approve of the remarks made by the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe). They are worthy of the place and the occasion, and I hope the sentiments which he has expressed upon this floor will be taken into serious consideration by this Convention.

Mr. SHERROD said: I had no agency, Mr. President, in bringing these resolutions before the Convention, and it is to be regretted, sir, that they have been introduced here, inasmuch as they have created heart-burnings and caused gentlemen to criminate and re-criminate each other upon this floor.

I voted, sir, against laying these resolutions upon the table, from the fact that they not only embody my sentiments, but the sentiments of the people of Indiana, and I may say the friends of law and order, the friends of the Union throughout the nation. Now, sir, we have these resolutions before us, and what do they ask of us? Simply to recognize or endorse the late compromise acts of Congress. I see nothing uncommon or dangerous in this; it is simply an expression of opinion.

The question, then, is, shall we endorse them, or shall we disprove of them in a summary manner by allowing them to lay upon the table. For one, sir, I hope the resolutions may be passed by an unanimous vote. I am unwilling that it should be said of Indiana that she refuses to stand by our inestimable Constitution and its compromises, and that her people are not a law-abiding people. And, sir, if this Convention refuse to adopt these resolutions, after the debate that has taken place upon this floor, I ask, sir, what will be the natural inference of our sister States? Why, sir, it would be heralded forth upon lightning wings, from the centre to the circumference of the Union, that Indiana, the great conservative State of the Northwest—the key-stone of the Union, has fallen from her high and enviable position—that she refuses to endorse the late compromise acts of Congress, and instead of pouring oil upon the troubled waters, she is adding fresh fuel to the fire of incendiarism in the North and in the South. Sir, this is a grave question, and we should approach it with a spirit of harmony, concession, and compromise.

But let us examine, sir, for a moment, the objections urged by those who oppose the adoption of these resolutions. In the first place it is contended that we have no right to pass these resolutions. Now, sir, I assert that we have not only the right, but inasmuch as they have been introduced here, it is a duty that we owe to ourselves and our country to adopt them. Sir, I cannot agree with the gentlemen who de-claim so loudly against the Convention giving an expression of opinion upon this question.

I believe it is the right as well as the duty of the people, whether assembled in mass, or through their representatives in Convention, in conferences, or in legislative bodies, to give an expression of their sentiments upon any question in which they may feel deeply interested; and I ask who will attempt to say that the question now under consideration is not one of great magnitude, and one in which the people are vitally interested. It is a question, sir, which involves the destiny of this nation; a question, sir, which, in my humble opinion, rises as far above any other National question as the heavens are above earth. And yet gentlemen talk about this question as though it was of no importance, and bring up their sickly objections against the Convention. But, sir, these objections emanate from the wrong side of the House to exert an influence.

They come from those who have said that we have nothing to fear from the agitation of the slavery question, and that the negro has as much right and is as capable of exercising the elective franchise as the foreigner who emigrates to our country. Now, sir, when I hear gentlemen make such assertions as these, I am ready to conclude that the reason of their opposition to the passage of these resolutions, is not because they think the Convention has no right to act upon them, but because they are not sound upon the slavery question. Gentlemen talk as if there was no danger of a dissolution of the Union, and assert that we have nothing to fear from the agitation of this question, and that no one really believes that the Union is in danger, and that the cry of disunion emanates from a set of political demagogues, who take advantage of the excitement for the purpose of manufacturing political capital. I do not pretend to say that gentlemen are not honest in making these assertions. I will say, this however, that if they believe what they assert, they cannot be conversant with the passing events of the day; they have but poorly noted the signs of the times. It is true, sir, that the Union has been preserved thus far. The old ship of State, though storm tossed and tempests tried, as she has been, rides majestically upon the turbulent waters of the political sea. But, sir, can it be expected that her bulwarks will out-weather the political storms that she is continually encountering? Can it be expected that she will sail safely through the rocks and quick-sands that surround her, and that she will outride the storm. When hoarse and threatening murmurs are already heard in the distance, active and vigilant indeed must be her crew, and wise must be her pilot, if she shall reach her destined haven in safety.

Sir, I have no sympathy in common with those who can look with indifference upon the excited state of the community, and fold their arms, and count the cost of the Union by dollars and cents, and denounce those who have been instrumental in bringing about the late compromise acts of Congress as political demagogues, and that they in the plenitude of their wisdom and authority will trample the laws of the country under foot. Sir, I regard such as ruinous to the best interest of the country, and I believe if the fathers of the Revolution could be resurrected and their spirits appear here, instead of recognizing them as their legitimate descendants, they would denounce them as the greatest traitors the world ever saw. But, says one, I have no objections to the late compromise acts of Congress, except the fugitive slave law, and I cannot support it because I tlemen will take the trouble to examine this monstrous law as they term it, they will find that there is no new principle embodied in it. The law of 1793 does not differ from it in its essential principles. Let it not be said, then, that this act of Congress has trampled upon any established principle. But, sir, it is an easy matter for the fanatics of the North and South, to bolster up objections to the laws of the land, in order that they may be enabled to carry on their unholy crusade against the Union. I had hoped, sir, after the convulsions which the country has passed through upon this exciting question, and after the result of the deliberations of a Congress that has attracted more interest than any other ever assembled in the Nation, had been submitted to the people, that the troubled waters would still, and the country would be relieved from this harrassed excitement. But, sir, I am disappointed in my brightest hopes. The watch-word has passed, and the shout is "agitate, agitate." When we turn our eyes to the North we see the incendiary torch burning more brilliant than usual. Public meetings are held, in which they boldly denounce the Constitution and its compromises, and threaten to trample the compromise acts of Congress under foot.

In the South they have counted the cost of the Union, and some of their Executives have already gone so far as to recommend secession. Sir, what can we expect, if this state of affairs continues long? Dissolution must be the inevitable result; though I hope it may not be the case. I trust that He who holds the destiny of nations in His hands may avert the calamity. I am not one of those who believe that the Union is invulnerable; and when I assert that I believe that the Union is in danger, I only assert that which the signs of the times strongly indicate. Man is born to die, and so are nations; and do we expect to escape the universal doom? Do we expect immortality in a world strewn with the mouldering wreck of fallen empires. Our dissolution may be protracted for countless ages, if we, and those who are to follow after us, are true to the principles of the Revolution—the Constitution of our country. Sir, I am no alarmist, prognosticating future calamities. Other nations have crumbled into ruins in the full tide of prosperity, and why not ours? The agitation of the slavery question has already convulsed our country until she stands trembling, as it were, upon the very verge of destruction. Can I, therefore, be blamed for raising a voice of warning, when the clouds of coming events are even now darkening our political horizon? Can it be wrong, I ask, to make an effort to avert the evil day? If the foaming breakers are already distinctly visible, common prudence demands that every precaution should be used which the emergency demands. Then I ask, sir, if it can be difficult to define the duty of this Convention in regard to these resolutions. I think not.

Holding, as we do, the high and enviable position as the great conservative portion of the Union—constituting, as we must ultimately, if we are true to ourselves, the national basis of the Union—national in our locality and resources—with the gates of access to the Atlantic on one hand, and the Pacific on the other—how important is it that the people of the North-West should view this important fact in its proper light. Disunion to us, sir, would be most disastrous; it would strike down the arm of enterprise that is lifting up this great valley to wealth and greatness; her teeming resources would be taxed at every port upon the Atlantic and Pacific, and even upon the Mississippi. No disunion can take place if we are true to ourselves. Then, sir, let ours be the task of guarding, at the peril of our lives, the ark of our political salvation. It is to the North-West that the defenders of the Union must look for aid in shaking down the stronghold of political corruption that is endangering the peace and harmony of the country. Then, sir, let us adopt these resolutions. Let us say to the factionist of the North, and the disunionist of the South, that we are tired—that we are sick, and heartily sick, of this eternal agitation; we are satisfied that it cannot result in good, but the reverse; and we, in the spirit of brotherly love, as members of the same great national family, appeal to one and all to come up to the altar of your country, and bury your animosities. [Applause.] And if the sentiment be true that is engraved upon the block of marble that is to have a place in our national monument, that “Indiana knows no North or South—nothing but the Union,” let her people, through this Convention, say so in terms not to be mistaken. [Cries of “Consent! Consent!”]

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I had not the slightest idea of saying a word on this question; but as debate has arisen, and gentlemen are expressing their opinions in regard to it, I feel it to be my duty to make my views known also. I respond most heartily to the sentiment expressed by gentlemen, that this Convention has nothing to do with the subject. I consider that its introduction is uncalled for and inappropriate. I know, sir, that the delegates to this Convention were sent here for the purpose simply of amending the Constitution of this State; and that, anterior to their election, they took the high ground, before the people, that party and political discussions were not to be entered into by this body. Every delegate upon this floor, I have no doubt, during the canvassing for the election of the members of this body, repudiated the idea of introducing propositions of the character of the one under consideration into this body.

I wish to be understood, sir, in regard to these propositions which I am asked to endorse here; and as gentlemen are desirous of getting the opinions of members, for one, sir, I will condense my opinions, without going into detail, by saying they are infamous, and I will not endorse them.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of talk about political trickstering by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) and I have only to say, that, if there is a gentleman upon this floor who understands that game better than he does, I would like to hear from him. [Laughter.]

In regard to these resolutions, I have only to say that their author, the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) must have known that their introduction was like throwing a fire-brand into the Convention.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). I did not know any such thing.

Mr. SMITH. Well, the gentleman must have understood that this Convention would not endorse all the opinions contained in them.

If there is any division upon this subject in the county from which the gentleman is a delegate, let him go home and call a public meeting, present his resolutions, discuss them before the people, and set his constituents right; but do not let him introduce them here, for the purpose of creating dissension in this body. The course of action upon this question has been somewhat singular. The proposition, when first introduced, was laid upon the table, after some very pungent and powerful remarks made by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. (Mr. Pettit). A proposition to re-consider is then brought up, and the gentleman from Wayne, having succeeded in getting the question open, proposes to accept an amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in the hope that it will go forth to the world as a democratic measure. Sir, I see through all this manœuvring. The gentleman from Posey endeavored to make his position a plausible one; but any one that is accustomed to political stratagem and trickery, can easily perceive the object of the gentleman from Wayne. He has presented these resolutions, and accepted of the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, in the hope of passing off his resolutions as an expression of democratic sentiment, when their endorsement by democrats would be enough to sink the party. I shall vote against these resolutions, sir, and I shall vote against the motion to re-consider. I care not from whence propositions of this kind may emanate, I am entirely opposed to their introduction in this body. I said to my constituents, before coming here, that I should lend my aid in the suppression of all political or party controversy; and when I see gentlemen endeavoring, through stratagem, to build up political capital for themselves, I feel much more strongly inclined to oppose their efforts. The whole object of these resolutions and of these efforts is to advance some political speculation or purposes which it is not proper here to refer to.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). For the purpose of sinking our Senators.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President: I look upon those resolutions as far above all party considerations. I look upon them as intimately connected with the peace and prosperity of the Union. I look upon them purely as a rebuke to nullification, and a renewed pledge of unwavering devotion to the laws and the government by which our fathers bound the Union together. I look upon it as our imperious duty, standing in a position that gives weight and influence to our opinions, that we express our abhorrence of the treasonable resolutions which have been sent forth through the public journals, in this and other States, threatening to trample under foot and set at defiance a law emanating from a provision of the Constitution, which was designed as a sacred and imperishable bond to perpetuate freedom to man.

Sir, it is objected that these resolutions are foreign to our duties, and unworthy of our consideration—that they have been proposed by a political doctor, with unworthy designs, and that the Convention should loathe and reject them. For one, I repudiate the aspersion. I believe they were introduced to throw oil upon the troubled waters. I see no “spectres in the air,” nor do I “snuff the tainted breeze.” I believe they were introduced from patriotic motives, and the previous question was demanded only because the mover wished to prevent a waste of time, and avoid debate upon so inflammable a subject. Sir, I will take a political dose, prepared by a doctor from any party, if it be good to cure disease and restore health. I have no squeamishness from whose hand it comes. But it is said it is designed for a party nostrum. Sir, it is strange to me how gentlemen can entertain this opinion, where they see political parties divided upon the subject all over the Hall.

Sir, I am amazed when I look back upon the eight months of unceasing struggle in our late Congress, to harmonize the threatening elements of discord—when I see them smothered, but not subdued—when I see the flames creeping like a serpent through the body politic, ready to burst forth with renewed fury—I say I am amazed that men can stand as unconcerned spectators. Sir, I fear that those who scoff and laugh at the threatened danger of disunion, will see the light burst upon their vision with melancholy truth.

Sir, why all this muttering thunder in the distance? What means this rocking of the earth to and fro? Sir, I sincerely fear the agitated elements will ‘burst forth, severing our fair land into belligerent fragments, unless the echo of “the Union, one and inseparable, forever,” is made to reverberate through all our borders.

Are the threatened discontents of sovereign States to be utterly disregarded, when expressed through the legitimate organs of their Legislatures? Are we so infatuated as to scoff at the fears of those bright and burning lights in our last Congress, who have stood upon the watch-tower with sleepless eyes and aching hearts, using their weapons with giant strength, to preserve the unity of the Union? Have these men been warring with a phantom? Strange, indeed, that such a political blindness should obscure the vision of any.

Sir, I fervently hope that members will withdraw their opposition to these resolutions; that whatever of weight and influence we possess may be thrown into the scales of peace, and have the effect of allaying the passions and prejudices, which have grown into frightful animosities. Sir, is it nothing to Indiana that nullification raises its treasonable crest in her borders? Does it not concern Indiana whether the notes of peace or war shall be heard ringing in her ears? Are the memory of our fathers to be forgotten, and the Union they bound together and cemented by their blood, be broken asunder as a bowl at the cistern? Are we not here to provide for the peace and welfare of the people? Shall we liken ourselves to some of the captains of fire companies of the cities, who, though they have been elected as guardians for the safety of the city, desert it in a state of conflagration to guard our private funds? I hope not, Mr. President. I hope the voice of Indiana will be heard, and hailed as the harbinger of peace and an offering of harmony. I thank Heaven the spirit of union and patriotism is abroad in the land, encountering the spirit of disunion and a defiance of law and order. I fervently hope that good counsels may prevail, and that discontents and animosities may be hushed into silence. The States of Kentucky, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, by immense gatherings of the people, with their well-tried and noble leaders in their midst, have set us a praiseworthy example: Let us follow on, and may our response mingle with theirs like a sweet chorus in the ears of the Union.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I do not desire Mr. President, to debate this question, for I think already it has been debated too much. I merely desire to give the reason which led me to vote to lay the resolution on the table.

I voted to lay these resolutions on the table, because I thought it not proper and expedient for this Convention to make any expression on the subject referred to in them. I admit, sir, if there existed a real crisis—if our government were really assailed with any serious purpose to resist, or overthrow it, we might be justified in raising our voice to its support. But I have not, as yet, perceived that such crisis does exist. I do not believe, sir, that there is any disposition in our State to resist the laws of the government, or to dissolve the Union. I was not disposed to vote for the consideration of this question, because I feared that its agitation here instead of allaying excitement would create an impression that there was an excitement, when, in fact, there existed none. I do not think there is any excitement in this State, of that kind, whatever I believe the people of this State have made up their minds to submit to these laws, whether right or wrong, so long as they are laws. I am very far from saying that the people ought not to seek to amend a bad law, or that their mouths ought to be shut, and that they should not have the liberty of questioning the propriety of these laws. And, allow me to say, that, in my judgment, if we are to pass resolutions on these subjects, we ought to do so deliberately and advisedly. I do not think it reasonable in the excitement of debate, to suppose that we can consider with that wise discretion, which becomes us, the amendments that may be offered.

I cannot quite vote for these resolutions, nor can I vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). I prefer that the subject should be referred to a committee, and that that committee frame such resolutions as every member of this Convention can vote for. If we do not pursue this plan, the adoption of these resolutions, in their present form, by a divided vote, will do more harm than good.

Some gentlemen think that we ought to, by some expression of our opinions, chastise the abolitionists. Now, sir, I do not think this is any part of our duty. They are our fellow-citizens, and I want to convince them if we can, that they are wrong—wrong in attempting to resist or subvert the laws of the country. If we adopt any resolutions at all, they should be of a character to commend themselves to the support of all reasonable and patriotic men. I think, sir, that a committee could frame such a series of resolutions—so that this Convention could give a unanimous vote for them.

I cannot vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, sir, because, as my colleague remarked, they are based on improper assumptions. I do not think it becoming in this Convention to charge—as it is proposed to charge in these resolutions—upon any portion of the people of this county that they desire to dissolve this Union. I do not know this, and therefore, I will not say so. We have a right to express our approval of these laws that have lately been passed by Congress; but I do not think we are called upon to vote, to say that the people of the South are traitors, or that any portion of the people of Wayne county are traitors. But, sir, I am willing to vote to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the county; beyond that I do not think we should go.

Mr. STEELE. I voted against laying these resolutions on the table, Mr. President, and as gentlemen are assigning their reasons for voting to lay them on the table, I will briefly assign mine for refusing to lay them on the table.

I had occasion to remark the other day, at the time of the controversy between the gentleman from Putnam, (Mr. Badger,) and the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that it appeared to me that I was in a camp meeting; and now I would say that it has appeared to me since the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne were laid on the table, that I am in a mass meeting of the people, and not in a deliberative Convention. Do I believe, sir, that in voting either to consider these resolutions or to lay them on the table, that I am performing the duty I was directly sent here to perform? No, sir, I cannot think so. I tell you what I think: I am doing just exactly what I would do before a mass meeting, barely expressing an opinion in relation to certain laws recently passed in Congress, that have created some difficulty in the Union—that is, that I am a Union man. When I first came here, a list of the delegates, with their party creed, profession, age, &c., was prepared, and I put down my political principles on paper, in order, as one of the delegates, to complete that list. I then declared myself independent of all political names, that I legislated for the good of both parties, that I went for the State, and for the Union. In like manner, sir, I shall declare myself when called upon for either of the two series of resolutions here introduced, of which series I greatly prefer the substituted one of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). These are my sentiments, and why I shall vote to take up these resolutions from the table and vote in favor of sustaining the recent action of Congress; and thus, sir, I express my opinions, as I would before a mass meeting of the people.

Mr. SHOUP called for the previous question, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. FOSTER, who said: When the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) introduced his resolutions the other day, sir, a motion was made to suspend the rules and proceed to their immediate consideration; that motion, however, was not sustained by a two-third vote, although there was a majority in favor of it. I anticipated they would come up to-day for consideration, but I confess I have been astonished at the opposition made to their consideration.

The gentleman from Wayne, sir, is one of those independent whigs that I admire; and so far as I could note his action upon this floor he has not been disposed to bow with any great deference to any political clique. I therefore admire him the more because we appear to be somewhat similar in our characters in this respect. [Great laughter and applause.] I am not ashamed to own, sir, also, that although I profess to be a democrat, yet I am not a democrat of yesterday. I always think, sir, that these little fag ends and cliques are seeking to bias public opinion. We have specimens of the character of these efforts when we see gentlemen on this floor eating their own words. Some gentlemen who drew up resolutions for the action of the democratic convention, two years ago, now by their votes here have repudiated them, and you cannot find one who voted for the internal improvement bill fifteen years ago.

I believe, sir, had these resolutions been introduced by another source they would have met with the approbation of some gentlemen who do not approve of them. I voted against their being laid upon the table, and I shall vote in favor of taking them up. I do not altogether approve of the phraseology of the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, although there is very little difference as regards their tenor between them and those offered by the gentleman from Posey; all the difference is that those offered by the gentleman from Posey are shorter than the others—in fact are an epitome of the series presented by the gentleman from Wayne. I shall therefore be safe in voting for either of the series if they come up for our action.

In regard, sir, to the attack made by the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) upon the gentleman from Wayne, it did occur to me that he might have had a little more reverence for a gentleman so much older than himself, and that it would be wise for him to tarry at Jericho until his beard was grown, and then perhaps he would be listened to with more attention when he got up to address a public assemblage.

I have thought, sir, all along, when I saw the course pursued by the delegates from the northern part of the State on this negro question, that I could guess the course they would pursue in case a question like the present one should arise. And it is evident, sir, that some dare not come up to the scratch—that they are abolitionists at heart. There are one or two, the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) and others, who have come up to the mark, and have had the manliness to avow their real sentiments. [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen at the present day say that they belong to the young democracy, but I have been a democrat so long that I never expect to grow young in politics again. I adopted, some years ago, the Jeffersonian principles, and I adhere to them still. I am not one of those kind blown about by every wind of doctrine. There seems to me to be a great many of the nondescript class however—mere milk and cider politicians—that are neither "fish, flesh, fowl, nor even good red herring." For such men I have a great abhorrence. It is such men that I desire to show their hands; and if there be any here that are abolitionists or disunionists, I want them to come out and show it by their votes on this occasion. The subject has been introduced and we must give an expression of an opinion in regard to it. Gentlemen argue that it is not a legitimate subject for our consideration, but how often is it, sir, that we have national subjects introduced into our Legislature, and acted upon; and are we not as much the representatives of the people as the Legislature? Aye, sir, and of a higher grade too, than the mere Legislature; and an expression of our views on this subject will have a greater tendency to calm any disquiet that may exist in this State. Gentlemen undertake to say that there is no danger of disunion; but I maintain they are grossly mistaken. Why, sir, twenty years ago, when the Missouri controversy agitated the minds of the people, there was not one-twentieth part of the agitation existing that there is at the present time in the South, and portions of the East. Is not the South in arms, and are not the abolitionists sending forth their incendiary publications by thousands, creating excitement in the people's minds? Do you not find, sir, that large religious bodies have been and are even now dividing into northern and southern divisions? It becomes us, then, as delegates of the people of Indiana, to express our sentiments on this question. I care not, sir, from what source it has come. Some may object that these resolutions were introduced by a whig—but, sir, the question involved affects the interests alike of whigs and democrats in this Union, and it should receive their united action in this body. I desire, sir, that every man should show his devotion to-day to the Union of the States, by the vote he will give upon the question, whether or not he will stand by the compromise measures that have recently passed Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. If I knew that these resolutions would be under consideration a day or two longer, I would postpone my remarks, but from indications over the way, I suppose the previous question will be called.

I desire, sir, to notice briefly a personal attack upon myself by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). I am only sorry that I was not in the Hall to hear all his arguments, particularly where he lectured me in regard to my political career. I only heard a small portion of his speech. I have only to say to the gentleman, that I am not disposed at any time to try to accommodate my action to his peculiar view of things. Those with whom I have lived and acted politically during the last twenty years, are the persons to whom I am responsible here and elsewhere. To them I expect at all times to be ready to answer for my conduct, and I am sure that I can say, without fear of successful contradiction, that at all times they have known where to find me on political subjects, and I would be glad if my friend from Hancock could say as much.

A word, sir, in relation to the charge that I have been pandering to the abolition party; I ask the gentleman when and where? He, sir, was one of the standard bearers of the whig party, in '48—one who advocated the doctrines laid down by the whig convention, held in this capitol. I went forth, and the gentleman did also in that campaign, and advocated what was understood to be the principles of the whig party. One of these principles was that of the Wilmot Proviso, and I would ask the gentleman if he did not then advocate that as one of the whig doctrines of that period, and if he did not, at the other end of this building, introduce a resolution in regard to the organization of our new territories prohibiting slavery?

Mr. WALPOLE. As the matter has been settled by compromise, I am in favor of standing by that compromise.

Mr. KILGORE. I am in favor of the compromise myself, provided we receive anything in exchange for what we have compromised away—but I am not in favor of compromise all upon one side. Well, sir, as I was remarking, the principles of the whig party, of which one of them was the Wilmot Proviso, were advocated in 1848, by the gentleman from Hancock and myself; and for still holding to that principle the gentleman appears to consider me as pandering to the abolitionists. I have only to say in reply, that if it becomes necessary for me to change a political principle every year, in order to make a consistent whig, I no doubt shall soon cease to act with that party. If whigs are to be called upon to change their political principles to suit the dicta of certain politicians, who profess to belong to that party, I affirm for one, that I am not to be turned in that manner, and if that is to be the course pursued by that party, I shall soon cease to labor with it. If every new doctrine, broached by factious politicians—especially such a doctrine as that which the gentleman from Wayne and the gentleman from Hancock appear willing to endorse—is to be adopted as a portion of the whig creed, I am not a whig.

But, says the gentleman from Hancock, it is necessary that this Convention should act upon this subject, and should express their opinion in regard to it. He seems to concur entirely with the gentleman from Wayne on this matter, who, by the by, is an old politician of the whig school, and who, singularly enough, is found presenting propositions almost synonymous in character and detail, to those immediately afterwards offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). I cannot doubt that this plan was discussed out of this Hall, and that there was a mutual consultation among sundry old democratic and whig politicians maturing it.

Mr. RARIDEN. The gentleman's statement is altogether a supposition; there is not a word of truth in regard to it.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, there has been a very strange coincidence indeed, in regard to these two series of resolutions, that have been presented. The gentleman from Wayne, one of the old leaders of the whig party introduces a series of resolutions, and immediately after their presentation, the gentleman from Posey, an old leader of the democratic party, takes some slight exception, and offers a series of resolutions, as a substitute, which, though shorter, are the same in substance as those offered by the gentleman from Wayne, and that gentleman thereupon accepts them in lieu of those he has offered.

Mr. PETTIT. I desire to interrupt the gentleman from Delaware only for a moment. I think it has been understood that the gentleman from Wayne introduced these resolutions without having consulted any one. Now, sir, a prominent whig politician sitting near me has informed me that these resolutions were read to Jesse D. Bright, one of our Senators, who approved of them and advised their passage. There were other democrats present who also advised their passage. The gentleman I refer to, sir, who furnished me with this information, was Mr. Walpole.

Mr. WALPOLE. I would state, sir, as I have been referred to by way of explanation, that I was led to make the statement I did to him from the fact that the gentleman from Tippecanoe stated to democratic gentlemen that the adoption of these resolutions would be a condemnation upon our Senators. I stated in reply, that on the morning of the presentation of these resolutions, Mr. Rariden had read them to Jesse D. Bright, Mr. Read, and other democratic gentlemen.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would state, Mr. President, that it was after I had offered these resolutions that I read to Mr. Bright, and I read them to several other democratic gentlemen afterwards, and they all agreed that they should be adopted by the Convention. It was only last week that I read them to Judge Huntington. If gentlemen intend to make this a matter of personal veracity, I shall take other notice of it.

Mr. KILGORE. I am glad, sir, that my remarks have brought out the particulars of this new arrangement. The dénouement has proved, sir, that I was a good hand at guessing.

I was not advised, sir, that a consultation had been held with Mr. Bright, our Senator, in regard to these resolutions. I regret exceedingly that he considered it necessary to call upon leading members of the whig party to ascertain how he should act—or to obtain advice as to his subsequent course—in Congress, on this subject. I regret exceedingly that he should want this consolation—that he had not sufficient firmness to keep the position he has already occupied in regard to this subject—that is, of an absentee. [Cries of "consent, consent."] I know, sir, that nothing else could be expected from my friend from Wayne, than that he should be active upon this subject; for it was not more than six months ago, when foreman of the Grand Jury of the United States District Court of this State, that he reported resolutions endorsing, in anticipation of their passage, all the compromise measures, and desired to have them spread upon the record. He could not rest content without acting in the capacity of fore-runner, or leader, if you please, in the approval of those measures.

I rather think, sir, putting all these singular coincidences together, that there is a movement on foot on the part of the gentleman from Wayne and the gentleman from Posey, to break up the old political parties and build up a Union party, to be composed, I suppose, of the conservatives or old hunkers of either organization.

I wish merely, sir, in this Convention, to reiterate what I have said before, that I am no abolitionist. I have disavowed, at all times, concurring in their action. I am willing, sir, that the slaveholders should enjoy their property uninterrupted; I am willing that the principles of the Constitution in regard to them should be fairly carried out; and I am opposed to interference in any way with their rights within the limits of the States in which they reside. But, sir, while I am opposed to interfering with the rights guarantied under the Constitution, I am also opposed, on the other hand, to any law making it the duty of citizens of the free States to catch their slaves and carry them back again into slavery, and this, too, under severe penalties for its violation.

The gentleman from Huntington (Mr. Murray) says that these resolutions are right, and that we ought to endorse the principle contained in them.

Now, sir, it may be that some gentlemen consider it imperative in regard to all these measures, to endorse the action of Congress, but it is not so with me. If it were, I do not consider this is the proper place for it. We have come here for a different purpose—to revise and amend the Constitution of this State; then let us attend to our appropriate duties. When we have performed these duties, then we can go home and turn politicians if we choose.

I have only to say, sir, in reference to the apprehensions of dissolution of the Union, I have no fears of it. I am for the Union, sir, and not only am I for it, but I am opposed to giving encouragement to any who may favor disunion. I am one of those who would take the position that no other portion of this confederacy should dissolve it. I am not only opposed to dissolution, but I am in favor of preventing others who may desire it from carrying their wishes into effect. To effect this object, terrible as may be the alternative, I am in favor of carrying on a war of desolation into the very heart of the seceding States.

What effect, sir, in conclusion, I would ask, will the passage of these resolutions have upon those madmen in this State who are opposed utterly to these compromise measures? I believe there are very few of them in this State, but what effect will denunciations have upon them? Will it terrify or alarm them? Not at all. [Here Mr. K. was interrupted with cries of "question, question."] As I hear loud cries of question, sir, I will yield the floor.

Mr. NILES. I desire, sir, for only five minutes to occupy—

Cries of "question, question."

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention second the call for the previous question?

Mr. PETTIT. I move that the Convention adjourn.

Upon this motion a division was called for, and being taken resulted as follows: ayes 52, noes 48.

So, pending the question, the Convention adjourned until Monday morning, 9 o'clock.

MONDAY, Dec. 2, 1850.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CAMP.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the motion to re-consider the vote by which the resolutions introduced by Mr. RARIDEN were laid upon the table.

The previous question having been moved by the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. SHOUP.)

Mr. RARIDEN. Before the question is taken on the motion to re-consider, I do think it is due to me that I should have an opportunity of placing myself right; and I appeal to the House to allow me an opportunity to do so. As some opprobrium has been cast upon me for having introduced these resolutions—

The PRESIDENT. The previous question having been demanded, the Chair will remind the gentleman that debate is out of order.

Mr. RARIDEN. I ask the gentleman from Franklin to do me the favor to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SHOUP declined to withdraw the demand.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley inquired of the Chair what would be the effect of the previous question if sustained.

The PRESIDENT replied that it would bring the Convention to a direct vote upon the motion to re-consider the vote by which the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne were laid upon the table.

The question was then taken on seconding the demand for the previous question; and the demand for the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. RARIDEN. I am very glad, Mr. President, of this opportunity to place myself right before the country upon this subject. I am always willing to be responsible for what I do, and for what I think. But I am not willing, on any occasion, to see gentlemen conceal their own timidity or political tergiversations behind an assumption of my rashness. I intend to place myself correct, and, if in my power, to place them correct, too. ["Consent!"]

Now, it is said that this is an improper place and an improper time for bringing forward these resolutions; and that is the pretext of some gentlemen for making opposition to them. Notwithstanding, they say, they cordially concur in the sentiments put forth in these resolutions; but it is the time, place, and manner that they object to.

Now I ask them first to consider in what consists the strength of the Union of these States? I ask them to consider if it consists in anything else than that common kindred feeling of kindness and attachment towards each other, and that confidence which exists among the several States—that feeling, which is cherished from one end of the Union to the other, of fidelity, of justice and forbearance toward each other. This is the great bond of Union, and nothing else. And the instant you destroy that spirit of forbearance and mutual concession that should exist, you destroy the Union itself. Well, what are we here for? Gentlemen say to make a Constitution—to establish a fundamental law for the State. Yes, sir; to re-adjust, in the glorious constellation, the State of Indiana; and if there be any difficulty in the way of such adjustment—anything that will not redound to the perpetuity of the Union—to relieve it of the difficulty. This is the object which we have in view. And it is presumed that we bring with us, from each county of the State, a large amount of veneration for, and devotion to, the institutions of our country. It is presumed that we are acquainted with the sentiments of the great mass of the people in regard to their estimation of the Union of the States. Look abroad over the States. You see meetings held in various parts of the country, and much excitement and bitterness of feeling prevailing; you see legislative bodies and Conventions assembling, for the purpose of denouncing the action of the Congress of the United States, and the accord of the free States in the compromise measures they say is hypocritical, and boldly avow that they will not live up to their professions. These are the pretenses that are seized upon by the enemies of the Union in the South to bring up public sentiment to the most desperate acts and measures which have so much agitated the Union, which make it necessary for the free States to speak out and vindicate their faith and allegiance.

We see meetings held in the free States, producing popular commotion, and denouncing a law of Congress in the plainest terms, under pretense of speaking public sentiment. I desire to contradict this false and groundless opinion, so far as Indiana is concerned. Come out and speak candidly about this matter, and tell the world what is to be expected from this quarter in regard to those measures. Let us say that Indiana will or will not stand by the compromises. Speak out and say what is your opinion of public sentiment upon those great and agitating measures, that the sister States may know how to regard us. Some gentlemen say I want to make some capital for myself. Well, sir, that is a laudable ambition. Who here that does not desire to raise himself in public estimation? And let me say, as a member of this House, who is it that has enjoyed more public confidence than I have? I have had more than my share for the last twenty years, and I have introduced those resolutions to maintain that confidence which has ever sustained me; and I thank God I have not yet passed the culminating point, though I am fifty-five. If I should go down, I have reason to congratulate myself that I have had little cause for grumbling at the treatment that I have received from my fellow-men; and if, for this act, confidence should be withdrawn from me, the space will be left for others to revel in, and they should be the last to find fault with me.

But, says the gentleman, do not let us go for it, because he is an old broken-down politician—hack politician. Well, whether that be true or not, I say nothing. I am still on my feet, at all events, and ready to do service with any gentleman who thinks so. Now, let me pay my respects to the letter in the Jeffersonian, read by the little gentleman from Wells, from George W. Julian, I suppose, the representative in Congress from the district where I reside.

It was published in that dirty sheet, and whenever I can draw public attention to and name its correspondent, it is all that is necessary for my security and defense. They already know the paper, and they know the editor, and when I get them to know the correspondent, all danger is over. That is enough for me, and let me add that I do not feel myself called on to notice every whiffet that may be hissed on to my heels, or who may be prompted to bark at me. This is all the notice that I shall take of such tripe.

Well, now, as to the pretense of the rashness and wantonness of this act. I take the whole responsibility on myself. I prepared the resolutions and brought them forward without consultation with any one.

My friend from Tippecanoe, although he concurs with the sentiments embodied in the resolutions, is of the opinion that they come from the wrong quarter. They come, he says, from a broken-down politician.

Mr. PETTIT. I did not say so.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, they come from a whig, and that does not suit the gentleman. It is true that I am a whig, but I am for the Union. Let me say, for myself, that the conception was put into my head in the first place, by Tom Walpole, here. He named it to me, and I determined on the instant to prepare and present resolutions, and I have done so. I mentioned to several gentlemen that I was going to introduce resolutions, and told them the character of the resolutions, and they concurred with me in the view I took. This is the whole secret about it. Well, I suppose when I said that there was a gentleman over the way from Delaware, who, at the suggestion of my friend here, began to make charges against me that the resolutions were gotten up by a secret conclave.

Mr. KILGORE. I heard no such thing intimated. What I stated was a mere conjecture of my own.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, the gentleman will remember when I disclaimed it, his friend and mine (Mr. Pettit of Tippecanoe) re-affirmed that they had been shown to Jesse Bright, when Jesse Bright was named as connected with me I heard over the way rapping and applause, and it was repeated in various parts of the Hall. What did that mean? What, but that the friends of somebody else had got Jesse Bright on the tender hooks with me, and that it might be the means of making Jesse Bright share the fate of the political juggler that he was in colleague with; that was the meaning of the rejoicing.

It has been suggested in various quarters that Jesse Bright was brought into consultation with me on this subject. This is not true; but if he had been, it would have been proper enough, because he was one of the compromise committee of thirteen. Now I do not know any thing about Mr Bright, except as a politician. I approve of his course and I do not care who knows it. [Applause.] He is a man who gives his opinions to the world freely, openly, and above board. He has shown no disposition to shrink from responsibility, and should not have any such charge made against him.

Mr. PETTIT. The committee of thirteen did not report the fugitive slave law.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, sir, I do not go into that matter; who did or who did not is no concern to me now. It is the act done I have in view.

Mr. PETTIT. I do.

Mr. RARIDEN. But the resolutions came from an old, broken-down hack. Well, sir, after I read them to the House, I happened to go outside of the bar, and I met Jesse Bright. He said: "What have you been doing?" I replied I would show him, and sat down and read the resolutions to him, and he remarked to me, after hearing them that he cordially assented to everything contained in them. Now I will tell you why I refer to this affair. My friend, here, supposing it might have some influence on somebody, whispered about that they were intended as a censure upon our Senators in Congress.

Mr. PETTIT. True, I said so.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, the gentleman is mistaken. Is there anything in the resolutions that amounts to a censure upon our Senators? Now I acquit the gentleman of having anything against me. But is he in the right position to bring a charge against me of endeavoring to make political capital? Does he expect to meet me as a competitor for a seat in the United States Senate before the Legislature? Not a bit of it. My friend from Delaware says he will meet me in my district before the people. The gentleman will not have an opportunity.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Randolph (Mr. Hawkins) is responsible for that.

Mr. RARIDEN. But the gentleman from Delaware says he holds me to an accountability for this said work. Well, I only ask him to show his hand, that's all. The gentleman from Switzerland has talked like a man. There is no skulking or concealment about him. But let me take my friend from Delaware, the man who has been in the bush always, and who never hears the report of a gun, or feels a concussion in the political atmosphere, without retreating into the bush until the elements settle and the sky clears away. When the political atmosphere is disturbed, when difficulty manifests itself, and he does not know how the current will set in his district, he stands aloof and awaits the issue, and is ready then to take the side that is popular. But he supposes that a broken-down politician is at the end of this movement. He ought not to talk about me as a politician, and as having been in Congress. It is his own fault that he has not been there. Does he not know that he has been solicited—that his district has been importuning him for years to suffer himself to be elected! But Cincinnati-like he stands back, and refuses to have honors heaped upon him. But there is at present an undulation in the political atmosphere in his district, and he cannot tell when the elements will settle. When they do settle he will be the first man upon the battle-ground to gather the laurels of the victors.

Now, a single word as to my colleague, who never does anything inopportune or imprudently. His first conception, he says, was, that the time was improper for the introduction of these resolutions, and he therefore regretted their introduction extremely. Now I can illustrate all this by a maxim from the philosophy of the father of the delegate from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) which is, that what a man will do, think, or determine on, depends very much upon the circumstances which surround him at the time. Now here is my friend from my county, (Mr. Beard,) I can account for his course upon this maxim. He is the nominee of the whigs, the democrats, and the free-soil, or abolition party. He has not lived as I have. He has lived in quiet, and I in a whirlpool. He has committed himself. He and I occupy the extremes. He is opposed to the fugitive slave law because he is opposed to slavery; and he is in favor of an underground railway. Well I am opposed to all this, and because I say so, he fancies me rash and imprudent. But my colleague does not wish to offend any party, and to be in favor with all parties. I will say to him, if that course is pursued from political considerations, that he need not apprehend danger from me by my opposing him for Congress. I shall not be found opposing him for any station that he may aspire to, nor do I believe that inaction upon an occasion like this is the popular course in times like these. I know the man in every shade and variety of his character, and I know him to be above all improper influences, and I could not be tempted with any bribe of ambition to set myself up or to set anybody else up in opposition to him. But when I say this, I am merely doing justice to myself. He is not the spirit to act with rashness or injustice on any occasion. He has always acted prudently and has gained and retains the confidence of all parties.

One other word, sir, and I am done. We are the representatives of the people. The people are in doubt whether we are in earnest about these compromise measures. We are presumed to know the sentiments of the people, and I want to give out what we think in regard to the public sentiment concerning these measures. When I brought the proposition forward, I moved to postpone the orders of the day, for the purpose of introducing the resolutions, which I read at the Clerk's table. The Convention refused to postpone the order of business by a vote of 60 for and 47 against—two-thirds being required—and I then put the resolutions in my pocket, but told everybody that I happened to converse with, that I should, at the proper time, move their adoption. The vote upon postponing the order of the day was, ayes 60, noes 47; showing a decided majority in favor of the resolutions before my friend here put down his foot and shook all the elements of party in this House. I deny that there has been any party spirit in regard to this matter. Although some may have been exhibited collaterally in order to make the impression that the resolutions were intended as auxiliary to some gentleman's ambition, what is it to the country whether these resolutions come from me, or from somebody else? I am not a politician. I am not in the way of any body—not soliciting votes for a seat in the United States Senate, not identified with any party that I can whistle up to sustain me when my views come in conflict with those of other gentlemen. The proposition comes from a man wholly without authority; it comes from the right quarter, from a broken-down politician, as the gentleman from Wells says. What have I to gain by it? What party or personal ends have I to subserve? It comes from the right quarter. It is introduced at the right time, and in the right place, and in the right spirit. Gentlemen must not expect to escape in this way. They must meet the question as it is, and not attempt to screen or hide themselves behind a charge of rashness against me. I did suppose that the resolutions would receive almost an unanimous vote, and I begged gentlemen to excuse me from calling the previous question, but they would not let me off. It was a fair instance that the call for the previous question was made. I relied wholly upon their judgment when I made the call, and it was sustained by a majority of the Convention. Then I am not more to blame for the call than others are for voting for it. The truth is, the only thing unpleasant about the whole proceeding is the danger and inconvenience it subjects politicians to on a delicate question that has two sides to it in their district; that is all, sir, there is where the pain comes from, and nowhere else—if they will speak candidly, they will say so.

Mr. PETTIT. As I have been considerably complained of for the course that I have taken in relation to these resolutions, I shall ask the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments. I said yesterday that if the gentleman had not moved the previous question, I should not have moved to lay the resolutions upon the table, but would have sought to amend them. I said then, and I repeat, that it is a course that is not justifiable on the part of any gentleman in this Convention to bring in a string of resolutions twice as long as both his arms, and demand the previous question before a word has been said in relation to them. These resolutions present a specious outline, and are such as are calculated, upon the first reading, to lead men away, whilst there may be, as I said, a cat in the meal tub or a snake in the grass, to be discovered upon investigation being made. And I now say to gentlemen of the Convention, that for its own credit and reputation if for nothing else, these resolutions ought to have been referred to a committee of school masters, for the correction of their phraseology.

Mr. President, it is stated here that I have been saying to gentlemen upon this floor that this is an attempt, on the motion of a whig, in a democratic Convention, to censure the democratic Senators of Indiana. I did say so. And I never say anything in an undertone that I am not willing should be heard in a louder tone; and I never retreat or take back anything that I say. I repeat that I so said, and that I now believe that that was the design and intention.

Sir, I did hear it said that Senator Bright desired that these resolutions should pass; that they were shown to him, and that he expressed his approbation of them. How came up this difficulty? The gentleman from Delaware, over the way, was charging that it was the action of the gentleman from Wayne, with two or three others, concocted in secret conclave. The gentleman from Wayne repelled the charge. He said there had been nothing of the kind, no consultation—that it was entirely his own act, his own thought, and that a few moments before, the gentleman from Marshall (Mr. Wheeler) happened to be sitting by my side, and I was using this language to him—that it would result in a censure of our Senators, for they had not, either of them, voted for the slave catching bill, and the gentleman from Hancock was near us and overheard the remark. And he took a piece of paper and wrote upon it these words: "I heard this preamble and these resolutions read to Jesse D. Bright, and he earnestly desired their passage."

Mr. WALPOLE. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, this is what I wrote.

Mr. PETTIT. Well, sir, I believe I have not misstated the language materially. The gentleman from Wayne said there had been no consultation about it. I got up and asked the gentleman from Delaware if he would allow me to make a remark, and he accordingly yielded to me the floor. I then stated that I understood the gentleman from Wayne to say that there had been no consultation. The gentleman from Hancock says that they were read to Senator Bright, and that he had cordially agreed to the sentiments contained in them, and desired their passage. Now if there is any difficulty it is between the gentleman from Hancock and the gentleman from Wayne.

Mr. RARIDEN. From the broad manner in which the gentleman from Tippecanoe made the assertion that he did, I understood him as intending to state that before I had introduced the resolutions, I had consulted with Jesse D. Bright.

Mr. PETTIT. Not at all. That was not what I said.

Now, allusion is made to my being a candidate for a seat in the Senate of the United States. That is all true. I am desirous of a seat in the Senate of the United States. I am desirous of pursuing such a course as to make it the willing offering of the people of Indiana. I am not willing to occupy or attain that position by any underhanded craft or trickery. No; I would spurn that or any other office in the gift of the people, if it could not be obtained in a straight forward and honorable manner. Sir, no action of mine shall lay one straw in the way of either the present incumbent, if he should be a candidate for re-election, or any other candidate. I would be the last man to do an act of injustice to him or to any other gentleman, or to endeavor to place them into an equivocal position. Why do I say that this was an attempt to circumvent the Senators from Indiana—Mr. Bright and Mr. Whitcomb. It was because neither of those gentlemen voted for this bill; nor is it, as the gentleman from Wayne supposes, that Mr. Bright had anything to do with concocting or bringing forward the bill. True, he was a member of Mr. Clay's committee of thirteen, from which the omnibus bill was reported; which bill contained provisions for the admission of California, for the organization of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, for establishing the boundary line between Texas and New Mexico, for prohibiting the slave trade in the District of Columbia; not one word was there in the bill respecting fugitives from labor, nor had Mr. Bright anything to do with the reporting of that measure or voting for it at all. It was the off-spring of J. M. Mason of Virginia. Gentlemen ought better to inform themselves of the political history of the day. Mr. Mason introduced this bill with a provision that all the post-masters in the country should be commissioners, justices of the peace, or magistrates, for the purpose of catching and returning runaway slaves. The bill subsequently underwent modification, and the judges of the federal courts were substituted in the place of the post-masters for the discharge of this duty, with the power to appoint commissioners for that purpose. And Mr. Bright had nothing to do with the bill from its inception to its completion. I said, therefore, it was a direct attempt to censure our Senators, upon the motion of a whig in a democratic Convention.

And I was justifiable in saying it. Now we have a new song, the praises of a new party—the Union party. The old platform is good enough for me. How often is it that men are led away by either blandishment or beautiful names? We have heard of the national republican party, the protection party, and the whig party of '76, and now we hear of the Union party; but soon as they get power they will adopt the measures and principles of the old federal party. It will be the same thing with a new name. Such will be your Union party wherever they can get power and strength. Another allusion was made to me, and it was said, that I would be referred to in the South as having been an abolitionist in Congress. To that I give the bold and unequivocal lie. That is plain language. Sir, I say there is neither a vote or a speech of mine, either in Congress or out of it, that tends in that direction. I have uniformly said, in Congress and out of Congress, that it was a blessing to the negro to be a slave, that it was a benefit to him and not an injury. I have said that it was a curse to the white man and not to the negro. No one will find language of mine contrary to this. I have both speeches and letters of mine upon this subject, short extracts from which, with the permission of the Convention, I will read. I have always held that the Congress of the United States has the sole and exclusive power to legislate for the Territories. Congress can prohibit or create slavery in the Territories—this is the language that I have ever used. Congress has power to do either; for Congress may dispose of the Territories as they please. Congress may sell them to a foreign country; Congress may prohibit their settlement, or make any other disposition in relation them that may be considered proper. They may allow them to be settled upon just such terms as they see fit to prescribe. Who denies this proposition? No one. Is there a lawyer in this Convention, or in the State, who will controvert it? Is it not a conceded question, notwithstanding the Nickolson letter, that Congress has this power? But the propriety of exercising it is another thing.

Sir, the negro question has been up before, and it has been said that the argument is exhausted entirely. Gentlemen come here, I will not say in this Hall, but out of it, as ignorant as the asses that they ride at home, and say that the question has been exhausted, and that they understand it and are ready to vote, when in fact the question has not been touched. The great question of population has not been touched, bound down, as we are, by our half hour rule. Talk to me about discussing the great principles of population, the principles by which any race of men is to be elevated and increased, or depressed and withered from the earth. Tell me that the question of population has been discussed. No, sir, it has not even been touched. Nothing has been said in relation to the negro character that could justify us in coming to a decision, or which could enable us to form an enlightened judgment. Sir, I say, and I repeat, that if it be humanity to perpetuate the negro race, to increase their numbers, to give them long life and happiness, slavery is their true condition, not freedom. I have the statistics here to show that twenty per cent more free negroes die, than slaves. I have statistics here to show that the negro population between 1830 and 1845, a period of fifteen years, (during six or eight years of which time the great slavery or anti-slavery excitement was prevailing in Boston, and throughout the Eastern States generally,) the negro population, not only did not increase, but actually decreased in numbers. Sir, go to the Moyamensing district of Philadelphia, go to the out-skirts of that city, and you will witness more degradation and death in the free negro quarter, a thousand times, than amongst the slaves of the South. I have said, and I repeat, that the quickest way to get rid of the negro population in the United States, is to turn them all free. Do this, and in a century you will scarcely find a negro on the Continent. They will die of sloth, of indolence, of disease, of filth and starvation. If it be philanthropy to continue and extend the race, to give them long life, you will in my judgment, as figures and facts demonstrate, keep them in slavery.

Now, sir, so far as this question is concerned I have been willing—true, the gentleman from Hancock said yesterday that I had a resolution prepared on this subject, so I have, such as do not need the schoolmasters' hand too, such as are directly applicable, such as I am willing to vote for. Sir, I have said heretofore, that I believed slavery was a curse to the white race, and it is admitted to be so even in the South. I have said that Oregon could not complain of me, that I had cursed her with slavery. I have often said, and always in kindness, that I have no sickly sympathy for the negro, that I believe he is better in slavery than out of it; and I have referred to the condition of the free blacks in the North. And I hold that this condition is best for him and his race. I referred in one speech of mine to the manner in which the arts of civilized life were introduced amongst many of the Northern nations of Europe. You can trace it from the past that the Romans carried to Rome thousands of captives, and made slaves of them. These learning the arts and sciences afterwards carried the knowledge which they had thus acquired into the countries from which they had been originally taken. Thus first sowing the seeds, or planting the germ of similar arts and sciences that flourished soon after, over the whole of Europe, without which Europe, perhaps might have continued to this day in comparative darkness and ignorance, as Africa has. And is not the same process going on in Africa? May not Africa heretofore profit by the seeds thus being sowed by means of the liberated slaves who have acquired intelligence during the period of their servitude. And thus may not our seeming oppression to them be turned to their great advantage. And may not Africa yet bloom from the very curse that was intended to make her sterile.

But, sir, as to these resolutions, here is a resolution that I am willing to vote for, covering the entire ground. Does it not comprehend the whole subject? Now, sir, here is a speech which was made in Congress in which I elaborate the question, as to the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the territories. But I do not intimate that it ought to be carried out, but the very reverse; this speech was delivered in Congress, June 12, 1848.

"He did not refer to these cases so much to show that this ordinance of itself was valid, as that ordinances of this kind might be valid, and that the action of this Government in reference to any Territory, providing for its settlement under certain conditions and stipulations, if settlers went there, must become at least morally binding upon them. It seemed to him he had said enough to satisfy any reasonable man that the ordinance of 1787, was in force, and consequently that another ordinance of similar character might be put in force. He did not say, nor should he pretend to say, whether slavery ought, as a matter of justice or right, to go North or South; whether it were a "pestiferous question," as the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) was pleased to say in the other end of the Capitol a few days since; he would not express any opinion upon that now, as his only object in rising had been to show that the authority existed in Congress to make all laws for the government of these Territories, whether it were for the protection or prohibition of slaves there. He held that the power of Congress over the Territories was ample, plenary, and complete; they might prohibit their settlement; they might leave them to be settled under such conditions as they pleased; they might create or abolish slavery there, as in their judgment it should be best for the interests of the Territories and of the whole Union."

Sir, that is the language I made use of. I repeat, I believe that these resolutions have no business here, and I shall vote, therefore, to keep them where they are, upon the table. If taken up, I shall vote to curtail them of their verbiage, to refer them to a committee perhaps, or to substitute something that shall express more properly the sense of the Convention. And I repeat again, that I am not willing to take allopathic doses of political medicine, mixed by my political opponents.

Mr. KELSO. This is a question, I am aware, that several gentlemen want to say something about, and perhaps it will be well that they should have some little time to prepare what they have to say. I will move, therefore, that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until next Saturday.

The question being put upon the motion to postpone, it was not agreed to.

[Cries of "question," "question."]

The question being upon re-considering the vote by which the resolutions were laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 60, nays 56—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Berry, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gootie, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moon-ey, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Sherrod Shoup, Sims, Steele, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Walpole, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Duzan, Garvin, Hardin, Hawkins, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Robinson, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—56.

So the vote was re-considered.

Mr. KILGORE. (addressing the Chair.) Are the resolutions now open for amendment?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, the question is upon the motion to lay them upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I will withdraw that motion, if I am at liberty to do so.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot withdraw the motion.

Mr. BORDEN. I would ask if the matter does not necessarily go over until resolution day?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, it does not necessarily go over, it is unfinished business, and must be disposed of now.

A MEMBER. Why cannot the gentleman withdraw his motion to lay on the table?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to withdraw a motion after it has been acted upon by the Convention.

A MEMBER. But this motion stands now, as if it had not been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT. The journal shows that it has been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KELSO. Has not the gentlemen the power to withdraw the demand for the previous question?

The PRESIDENT. It is in the same situation as the other motion, and subject to be rejected, but cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. KELSO. No action has been had upon this motion.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, but action has been had upon the subject matter to which the motion applied, and upon which it was intended to operate.

Mr. KELSO. It seems to me that the gentleman who made the motion, has a right to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT. The rule says that when the body has acted upon a motion, it is not in order to withdraw it. The Chair will remark that gentlemen can accomplish all they desire, by voting against laying on the table.

The question being taken upon the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I wish to make a point of order. The gentleman demanded the previous question upon his resolutions, before any question was stated by the Chair. It appears to me that he had no right to demand the previous question before any question had been announced to the Convention by the Chair.

Mr. RARIDEN. It was my desire to withdraw the demand for the previous question long ago, if I had been permitted.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. Is it in order to move to refer the resolutions to a committee.

The PRESIDENT. If by unanimous consent the gentleman from Wayne have leave to withdraw his demand for the previous question, it will then be in order to move that the resolutions be referred to a committee.

Mr. RARIDEN by consent, then withdrew his demand for the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. I now move that the resolutions be referred to a select committee of one from each Congressional district.

Mr. BORDEN. I second the motion.

Mr. KELSO. I move that the committee be instructed to—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will wait a moment.

Mr. KELSO. Cannot I accompany the motion to commit, with a motion to instruct the committee?

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first on the reference, and the gentleman can afterwards move his instructions.

The question being put on the motion to refer,

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken were—yeas, 46; nays, 69;—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, &c, Foley, Garvin, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Johnson, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Work, and Mr. President—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall, Logan, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Mowrer, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wundelich, Yocum, and Zenor—69.

So the resolution was not referred.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. MATHER moved to strike out the preamble and insert the following:

A resolution as is a resolution.

THAT WHEREAS, Abby Kelly Folsom, and Elwood Fisher, George Thompson of England, Wendell Phillips and wife of Boston, General Quattlebum of South Carolina, Gen. Quitman and wife of Mississippi, and others, are designing and traitorous men, and are raising a particular fuss generally, at this particular period of time; therefore, this Constitutional meeting, in Convention assembled, declares:

1. That the Union am in danger.
2. That from and after the first day of January next, there shall be a general time of peace and whoever shall attempt to contravene this decree, shall be hung without benefit of clergy.
3. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Superintendent of each Asylum for Insane in the United States."

The resolution was received amidst much merriment.

Mr. OWEN. Then I move to strike out the preamble and resolutions, and insert the following:

WHEREAS, The Congress of the United States passed at its last session, a series of acts, commonly called the compromise measures, and including the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves; and

WHEREAS, Certain misguided individuals in this and other free States, have expressed their determination to resist said fugitive slave law, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, the common sentiment of the people of Indiana sustains and endorses, in their general features and intention, the said series of compromise measures passed by Congress, and recognizes in the success of these measures, an earnest of security and perpetuity to our glorious Union.

Resolved, That whatever may be the opinions of individuals as to the wisdom or policy of any of the details of the fugitive slave law, it is the duty of all good citizens to conform to its requisitions, and to carry out, in good faith, the conditions of that compromise on the subject of domestic slavery, which is coeval with the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be transmitted to the Governor's of each State and Territory of the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart has precedence.

Mr. RADIDEN. I proposed long ago to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Posey.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart.

Mr. SHOUP. I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. COATES moved that the subject be indefinitely postponed.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to say a single word. I had intended to ask the house to excuse me from voting upon the proposition for I conceive that we have no more business to act upon such a subject as this, than we have to pass so many votes upon the subject of the moon's being made of green cheese. Sir, I have only this to say, that I do not feel that I have any right to occupy a seat here, day after day, receiving three dollars a day of the public money, engaged in discussing and voting upon a subject of this kind. I am willing to-vote for its indefinite postponement, because we have no business with it. But I do not ask the body to excuse me from voting. I wish to treat the body with respect, but I think they have no right to compel me to vote upon this subject. Suppose a gentleman should get up and offer a resolution declaring that the Chinese are the only civilized people in the world, would I be compelled to vote upon such a resolution? Was I sent here for such a purpose? I think not. I think the time of this Convention ought not to be occupied in expressing our views upon political questions. Such questions ought not to be entertained here. They serve no purpose but to produce irritation and excitement. I do trust that the House will come to its senses and proceed with its appropriate business. [Cries of "consent!" "consent!"]

Mr. NILES. I endeavored at the adjournment on Saturday afternoon to obtain the floor for the purpose of replying to some remarks which seemed to be personal to myself; but a very little time for reflection only was necessary to induce me cheerfully to waive any such privilege. I trust that I shall never be found occupying the time of this Convention in talking about myself, or my motives or consistency. Upon such subjects I am willing to leave my associates and the public to form their own judgment. I feel no great solicitude as to the result. And I shall occupy just as little time in assailing the motives or attempting to injure the feelings of others. I rise now to say that, unlike the gentleman from Allen, I shall not ask to be excused from voting on these resolutions. I intend to occupy my seat and vote upon every question that is submitted, whatever it may be; while at the same time I insist that these resolutions have no business here, and no member of this body could be compelled to vote upon them. Were I willing to present what might seem like a factious opposition to the will of the majority, which I will never do in any body with which I may be associated, I could defy you to require my vote upon subjects which have been so mischievously introduced here—which can result in no public benefit, and which are only calculated to promote personal aims, and to excite partisan and personal animosities. What are called the compromise measures of the last Congress, unless the fugitive slave bill be classed among them, are final and irrevocable in their nature, and no man in all the North proposes to disturb them. But I have no hesitation in saying that for one of those acts, as for the fugitive slave law in its present form, I never would have been compelled to vote. If gentlemen desire, and think that is a proper way of spending the time of this Convention—to bring in review every one of those acts, and will give me the privilege of discussing them section by section, and clause by clause, I am ready, in the elegant language which has been used in this debate, "to show my hand." But if called upon by a single vote to endorse them all in a lump,

I shall be fully careful not to affirm what may be questionable in any shape. No man would hesitate to vote for resolutions recognizing our attachment to the Union, and the duty of submission to the laws, though such resolutions would be idle and useless, as there is no difference of opinion upon those points throughout the State. When, however, I am irregularly called upon to give a useless vote to bolster up the conduct of any man, or set of men, I shall not be found even by implication approving measures, which had they been originally before me for responsible action, I might have, even in part, condemned.

Mr. OWEN. In reply to the gentleman from Allen, I have this to say: For the valuable time that may be wasted in the discussion of the resolutions before us, let those be responsible who introduced them here.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat.) Consent!

Mr. OWEN. They are here now, not by my action, nor yet with my vote. There is a single reason why we should now act upon them—a strong one—that is, that being here, a false inference would be surely drawn from their rejection, an inference pregnant with evil influence, if not with danger, both in the North and in the South.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say in reference to these resolutions that I shall not undertake to decide upon their merits, although I regret their introduction as inappropriate, and because they call upon us to express our sentiments on a part, instead of the whole of a very grave and important matter. But while I oppose the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, I for one, will not undertake, as some have done, to impugn the motives of that gentleman. I think that his motives were good, though I believe this was not the proper place for their introduction, and the whole moral effect, which of course should be the sole object, is utterly lost in the resolutions of the gentleman from Posey, and in a great measure, in those originally introduced by the gentleman from Wayne, by not embracing the whole merits of the subject.

The resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne did not refer to the treason of the North alone, but gently to the traitors in all but the overt act, south of Masons and Dixon's line; and I insist that if called on to deliver our opinion as to the present position of affairs in this country, we ought to give a general, not a one-sided opinion, as proposed by the gentleman from Posey. His resolutions refer simply to a few fanatics at the North, who have given out that they will oppose a law of the Union. I ask if there are not fanatics also at the South. If we condemn at all, let us condemn in toto. And in that view I sincerely coincide with the gentleman from Wayne, as far as he goes, although he does not go far enough; but assumes to embrace both sides of the question.

Mr. OWEN. In the resolutions introduced by me there is nothing said about traitors, either at the North or at the South.

Mr. HOWE. I am aware of that, sir, it is a term used by myself, and I think it is a correct one. I affirm that there are traitors at the South in everything but the overt act. I say if we express an opinion at all we should express a general opinion. It is unjust and impolitic to take a one-sided view of the case, and if we undertake to set ourselves up as judges, let us judge impartially; let our judgment go to the whole case, and not one side of it. And therefore I think the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, lengthy as they are, vastly preferable to those now before us. I say that I would much rather vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, than for those of the gentleman from Posey, although I do not intend to vote for either.

We have had some eloquent remarks this morning, by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) in relation to subjects that have never been before the Convention. I was not aware that we had under discussion the abolition of slavery until so informed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. It is entirely new to me.

Mr. PETTIT. We have had the question of admission or exclusion of negroes under discussion.

Mr. HOWE. What has that to do with slavery or the abolition of slavery?

Mr. PETTIT. I did not say it had anything to do with it.

Mr. HOWE. Then the gentleman has been arguing a question that was not before us. He has given us an elaborate argument in relation to the African race, to prove that they are in a better condition when in slavery than when free. He has placed the Convention in a false position.

I have no political aspirations. I have nothing to ask or expect; but my opinions I am ready to express at all times, and upon all subjects; and I say I hope that we shall hear no more of this kind of discussion. It is altogether out of place. If gentlemen here have political aspirations I have no interest in hearing them in this Hall on that topic. I care very little what any gentleman's position is, or what he is aspiring to. I hope that we shall have no more time consumed on such matters.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I shall be compelled to vote for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions because, like the gentleman from Lagrange, I think the amendment is worse, perhaps, than the original resolutions. I do not know whether the gentleman from Posey intended to convey the meaning which the wording of his preamble and resolutions evidently conveys.

The preamble reads thus:

"WHEREAS, certain misguided individuals in this and other free States, have expressed their determination to resist said fugitive slave law"—Resolved, &c.

Now, this refers exclusively to persons in the free States, who have expressed a determination to resist the operation of the compromise measures. I say I do not wish to charge any body with this treason, but I think if an indication has been expressed anywhere, of a wish to dissolve the Union, it has been in the southern States. There it is rumored that they have met in organized bodies, and have expressed the opinion that the Union should be dissolved. They are supposed to have done this, even in their regularly organized governmental bodies, but have the people made such demonstration in the free States? The only propositions of such a character that have been made in the northern States, have been the expression of unauthorized individuals, not representing the feelings of the free States. And, as a matter of justice, I would not charge our people in the free States with being the exclusive agitators of treason. Sir, I think it is not proper, or becoming in us to do so. Now, sir, the resolutions themselves state that there are certain compromise measures, but I understand by thus describing them, that these compromise measures are not to be regarded as laws, but in the nature of treaties binding us not as individuals, but as States, not to disturb these compromises. Now, I am willing to say that I will be obedient to these laws so long as they remain unrepealed, and I admit that the admission of California and the settlement of the Texas boundary question cannot be properly repealed, but I am not willing to say that they are all in the nature of treaties and irrevocable. I am willing to regard them simply as laws, leaving them to the approbation, or rather to the decision of the people of the U. States. While I will submit to these laws, I am not willing to say that I approve them in all their general features and in all their aspects and details. I do not wish to declare to the people of the south that these are the opinions of the people of Indiana, for I do not believe they are. I believe that the people of Indiana are of opinion that it was right to admit California, notwithstanding her Constitutional provision against slavery. I believe they supposed that this was right, but sir, they also supposed that this fugitive slave law should have been passed, if passed at all, in obedience to the demand of public opinion, and the injunctions of the Constitution, not as a matter of compromise, or offset against the admission of California. There is no compromise about it.

Now, sir, if the motion to postpone does not prevail, I shall vote to refer those resolutions to a committee, and I think the Convention ought to allow them to be referred. If we express an opinion we ought to do it deliberately, clearly and discreetly. As I have said before, nothing but an extraordinary occasion can justify this Convention in turning aside to notice a matter of this kind. This is a body called together for a great and a grave purpose. It is not a body that meets periodically under the organization of our government, but one that is called together to do an important, and unusual work, and therefore, our opinions will be regarded, if they ought to be regarded at all, by the people, as being entitled to great weight, it is demanded of us, that we exercise great circumspection in giving an opinion, that we may not discredit ourselves. Sir, there is but a step between the sublime and the ridiculous, as the gentleman from Elkhart has shown us by his amendment and we are nearly verging upon the ridiculous in traveling out of our way to notice things that we have nothing to do with, but which, if we notice at all, should be noticed in a solemn and becoming manner. I am willing to attribute to members of the last Congress patriotic motives. I concede, sir, that perhaps, they did the best that it was possible for them to do. They passed measures arising from the necessity of the case, and we are bound to submit to them so long as they continue to be the law of the land. But I am not willing to regard them in any other light than as laws. I am not willing to charge the people of the free States exclusively with being traitors, because I do not believe it is true. And I think that the south have complained of these measures. They have not been satisfied with the fugitive slave law. I do not think they had a right to demand that the people of California should submit to the evils of slavery. The people of that State had a right to demand to be freed from it, and Congress was bound to yield to their demand.

I am sorry that this measure cannot be so shapen that we can all vote for it. But I feel bound to vote for the indefinite postponement of the original proposition as well as the amendments, for I do not foresee any probability of procuring such amendments to these resolutions as that I shall feel authorized to vote for them I cannot admit that there is such an exigency as to compel me to vote for whatever any gentleman may choose to present on this subject, for the action of this body. I feel bound rather to vindicate my own freedom, and that of my constituents, and sir, without the slightest hesitation, I will vote against any proposition of which my judgment disapproves, but with no purpose or intent to resist the laws, or to dissolve the Union.

Mr. BIDDLE. I believe, sir, that the question is upon the indefinite postponement of this subject. And I feel like saying a word or two in relation to it, although I shall not allow myself to be dragged into a controversy in reference to the merits of the measures that were passed by the Congress of the United States at its late session. For I do not think that this Convention has any right to pass judgment upon those measures. As the gentleman from Delaware has said, it is altogether out of place. So far as concerns those subjects that properly come under our consideration, I am willing to be constantly in my seat and to take the responsibility of voting upon every one of them. That is the very end and design for which this Convention has been constituted. But I have no disposition to vote upon a question which has no relation whatever to the duties for which we are assembled. The expression of our opinion upon such questions will carry no more weight than an expression of opinion on the part of so many private citizens. I am inclined to resort to every legitimate method that will have the effect of putting an end to this controversy. I voted to lay the resolution upon the table; I voted to sustain the previous question, and I shall continue to vote against the resolutions without regard to the merits of the controversy. I deny the power of this Convention to drag measures in here to swell the sails of any politician. In legal phrase the whole matter is coram non judge, and I deny the power of this Convention to compel me to vote upon them or to punish me for a refusal to vote. I say this not out of disrespect to the mover of the resolutions or of the amendment; but I will not sit here day after day, and week after week, and participate in a discussion upon matters with which we have no more to do than we have with an inquiry into the authenticity of the Bible, or the doings of the devil.

I am not disposed to complain of the slowness of our progress by any means; I think we have got along remarkably well hitherto; but if we adopt these resolutions we take a step that will materially interfere with our future progress. Adopt these and we shall soon have another set of resolutions brought forward. I think, therefore, we had better postpone these indefinitely, and put an end to a thing that is entirely out of order. I deny that the vote in relation to these resolutions—whichever way it may be given—gives any expression of the views of Delegates.

Sir, if it were legitimate to express an opinion, I would say whatsoever is the law it is the duty of every good citizen to obey it. I shall unquestionably counsel obedience; but, sir, I will go against this Convention taking jurisdiction of matters which are entirely beyond the line of our duty, and undertaking to form a decision, whilst any decision of ours would be of no force or effect whatever. With great deference for the learning of honorable members of this body, I must say that a county meeting would, for the purpose of giving expression to their views and feelings in regard to measures that have been passed by Congress, carry with it quite as much weight and respectability.

Sir, it has been said that this Convention is omnipotent. It is, in a human sense, omnipotent in many things, but in regard to matters of this kind, so far from being omnipotent, it has no jurisdiction over them whatever. I call upon this Convention, then, to lay aside the consideration of this subject. If gentlemen wish to give expression to their views in relation to it, let them call a public meeting. But I think it an abuse of the trust that is confided to us as delegates to come here and squander our time and public money in a matter that is of no utility whatever. Now I wish to show no disrespect to this Convention, nor to the mover of these resolutions. He is a gentleman, always respected for his ability and patriotism, but his patriotism in this instance is ill-timed—let him exhibit it at the proper time, with the influence he possesses, and I am with him. But I shall oppose these resolutions in every shape known to parliamentary rules, and when they come to be voted upon I shall refuse to vote, and I claim to be exempt from voting as a matter of right. I put myself upon that platform as a matter of principle. The Convention cannot take from me the right to withhold my vote. I appeal to the Convention whether it is not more fitting and proper that matters of this kind should be discussed at a public meeting, and not in this Convention of the people which is assembled for a different purpose.

Mr. KELSO. Before taking the vote upon these resolutions, perhaps it may not be amiss to consider what it is that we propose to do in relation to the subject matter before us. It seems from rumor that within the limits of Indiana, and perhaps no further off than Wayne county, a public meeting has been gotten up at which a member of Congress made a speech, in which he denounced the fugitive slave law as a branch or portion of what is understood to be the compromise bill of Congress, and recommended resistance to that law. He declared that men should not hold themselves obliged to obey it, because it run counter to his notions of what is right. It is possible that a majority of that meeting may have coincided with him in that opinion. Although I believe that that is the only meeting which has been held in this State at which the subject was discussed, and thereupon these resolutions were introduced. Now is it supposed that the adoption of these resolutions will shut the mouth of George W. Julian? I imagine not. Will it prevent the people of Wayne county, or of any other county, from calling meetings and from calling upon George W. Julian to make speeches for them; and from applauding him for what he chooses to say; from giving him a general vote of concurrence in the sentiments he utters? I think not. They will still go on. I think there is great danger in taking notice of this public meeting in Wayne county. I think that the proceeding of ours in relation to it will agitate the public mind twenty times as much as the proceedings of that meeting could do. Will it not be an inducement for other counties to get up public meetings, and to produce excitement and ill-feeling that would not have existed had we not noticed it in the manner we propose to notice this matter? I think there is great danger of increasing the excitement instead of allaying it. I think you will find very few persons in the State who would be inclined to disobey the law of the land. I cannot approve of the introduction of such resolutions as these. Yet as they are here, I am in favor of having them amended, for I am opposed to taking any step on the part of the Convention that could possibly be construed as saying that we approve of the fugitive slave law. I repeat I will go against every measure that can possibly have that effect. But while it is the law of the land we are all bound to obey it. But suppose there are a few men in Indiana who are disposed to resist the law, do you believe—does any man here believe—that if we pass the resolutions that have been offered and are now pending, that these men will cease to disobey the law—cease to resist it? I apprehend not. They have their minds made up. They act upon what they consider to be principle, and I ask if they have not as much right to act according to their judgments as we have, so far as that law is concerned? Now I apprehend there are very few gentlemen who differ with me in expression, that the law ought to be amended. A single practical instance that has occurred in Indiana may decide this question. I am informed that an individual from Arkansas came here and claimed certain persons as fugitive slaves. A fair trial was had and the supposed slaves were found to be free negroes, and I am credibly informed that they are indeed white persons. They were afterwards smuggled off into Kentucky for trial. They were got on board of a steamboat, and the officers of the boat compelled the claimant to take them back. He seized them again, and they were held for trial before the courts to ascertain whether they were fugitives or not. In the mean time the cause was continued for testimony, and the attorneys in the cause came here to the United States Court. He then goes to Louisville, in Kentucky—has an ex parte examination there—procures testimony without giving any notice whatever—gets an order and obtains a certificate from the proper authority and comes here and demands a surrender of the fugitives. And the judge of the United States Court here feeling himself bound by the proceeding of the court in Louisville surrenders them, and they have been carried to Kentucky. Now if the law will bear such a construction as that, is there a man here or elsewhere who will deny that it needs amendment. Certainly if you are going to give the person claimed as fugitive a trial at all, should he not have a fair trial; and can any trial be called fair where the fugitive is not allowed to hear the evidence? Now I say if we pass these resolutions, w thereby approve of the law. I ask if we are not saying to our Senators and Representatives in Congress that the law is a good one, and that we are content with it, without amendment. That is the construction that will be put upon our action, and its tendency is to give a wrong impression of our views. They know that the law is not popular here. The principle may be correct, but the law in its details is not correct.

Mr. President, I maintain that the best thing that can be done with these resolutions is to postpone them indefinitely. It will not correct the expression of sentiment that was given at that meeting if we pass them; it will not prevent meetings from being held hereafter. It will not stop the people from talking; but, on the contrary, it is likely to stir up public feeling, and cause other meetings to be held, and induce them to repudiate our action as well as the action of Congress. For these reasons I go for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions.

Mr. WALLACE. I have been voting in a way which, perhaps, the gentleman from Wayne may consider as being in opposition to his resolutions; if so, I cannot help it. I concur fully in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Cass, and shall therefore continue to vote in the same way. I shall vote now for the indefinite postponement of the resolutions. I shall do so because I consider them out of place. It is no part of our duty to entertain them. They contain matters that the people never expected should be submitted to us. Why, sir, if the gentleman will only reflect for a moment, he will perceive that the subject of these resolutions belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, and, as a matter of course, if it meets or does not meet their approbation, if the laws the resolutions refer to are imperfect, if they are unpopular, if they are not called for by the people, the people, unquestionably, in the exercise of their legitimate power and duties, will act upon the subject constitutionally; and rightfully, through their representatives in Congress.

Mr. President, what would we make ourselves express if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Posey? Why, sir, not our individual sentiments or opinions, but we would aver roundly that these opinions and sentiments of ours are the common sentiments and opinions of the people of Indiana. Now, sir, other gentlemen may be better informed than myself upon this subject; although I have had, perhaps, quite as fair opportunities of ascertaining what the common sentiment of the people of my county is upon this subject, as any gentleman on this floor have had of theirs, yet I must confess that I do not know so as to venture to speak, as to what their general sentiment is. Indeed I have heard no expression from them that would justify me in saying here, by my vote, that it is the common sentiment amongst them that these resolutions, or the law passed at the last session of Congress for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, should be in all things sustained.

I ask gentlemen to look around them and tell me what evidences they have had that will justify them in voting for an affirmative proposition of this kind? Have you had any expression from your people upon the subject? None, unless it be an expression from a portion of the people of Wayne county. That is the only expression that I have heard in regard to the subject. The people have not agitated the matter sufficiently. We do not usually get an expression of popular sentiment regarding any measure until it is put in force, until the people have seen its practical operation; then, and not till then, do you get an expression of the public sentiment.

Mr. President, what are we doing by passing these resolutions? A certain portion of our fellow-citizens see fit to differ in opinion from the gentleman from Wayne. They are disposed to regard a portion of the action of Congress, in reference to the compromise bills, with disfavor. Have they not a right to do it? Most assuredly they have. I ask gentlemen of this Convention, therefore, if they are prepared to take away from them this right, if on the contrary, by entertaining these resolutions they do not give to their opponents a consequence, an importance, a standing which they do not merit? I have no doubt of it.

Mr. President, I hope that the charge of being an abolitionist will not be made against me, because I vote for the postponement of these resolutions. I ought to be above suspicion on this point, for when I had the honor of a seat in Congress, I voted to expel the high priest of abolitionism from that body—Joshua R. Giddings.

A VOICE. You have never atoned for that yet.

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir; nor I suppose I never can, in the estimation of an abolitionist. I voted, however, for that expulsion, and I speak of it now as an act that, under the same circumstances and influenced by the same impressions which then operated on me, I would cheerfully do again. I have no favors to ask. I voted upon that occasion regardless of consequences, honestly believing that the welfare of the country demanded such an example. I say, sir, that I will not now entertain, if I can avoid it, a set of propositions which we have no right to act upon—which it is no part of our duty to consider. I would not send forth from this body a set of resolutions calculated, as these are, to give consequence and character to any party with whom I have no affinity, and especially when that party, according to the representations of gentlemen around me, are in so vast a minority.

For these reasons, sir, I shall vote for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions, and I do hope that a majority of this Convention will come up to the work, and take upon themselves the responsibility of getting rid of a subject which, as we have already seen, has created unnecessary excitement amongst us, and that we may return to the legitimate business of the Convention. The time that has been spent upon these resolutions has been employed uselessly and to no purpose, unless it be to cater to the views and opinions of persons who may be aspirants for office in some shape, manner, or form.

Mr. TAYLOR. I shall not trouble the Convention with a speech upon this occasion. I feel, sir, in common with the citizens of the northern counties of the State upon this subject. I had nothing to do with bringing this matter into the Convention, but I wish to take some little part in getting it out, or in passing upon it favorably, and I trust we may do it in such a manner as will not stir up the already troubled elements of strife. The principle is one upon which I think we should express our opinions as delegates or as citizens. Is it possible that because we are delegates we are disfranchised—that we are divested of the privileges of free citizens—that if there be anything that interrupts the harmony of the country we cannot express our sentiments upon it? Now all gentlemen who are opposed to the compromise measures, or the fugitive slave act in particular, can, by their votes upon these resolutions, show that they are opposed. And those who hold with me, that the measure is a good one—one that is calculated to produce harmony and concord—can express their opinions by their votes. That is all we ask. We do not propose to create dissensions. We propose merely a quiet and peaceable expression of sentiment.

But, sir, the proposition being before the Convention, if it should be voted down, it seems to me it must strike every man's sense that the abolitionists—the enemies of the law in this country everywhere—would look upon it as an indication that we are opposed to the law ourselves. Would not that do harm? I think it would. And it seems to me that if we wish to act as men of sense—as wise men—if we would throw oil upon the troubled waters, we should adopt these resolutions. If they cannot receive the vote of this body in their favor, they ought never to have been brought forward.

I believe that the Legislatures of the several States that are meeting on this day, as well as the National councils, will expect an expression of opinion from this body, not in regard to the fugitive slave law alone, but in regard to all the measures of the Federal Legislature. Is it possible that these measures are of so little consequence as not to deserve an expression of opinion at our hands. When you see such men as Clay and Webster and the lamented Calhoun, and Douglass, devoting their energies for months to the work of devising and passing a series of measures for the establishment of peace and harmony throughout the country. Is it too small and unimportant a thing, I ask, for the people of Indiana to engage in? No, sir. That is not the true secret of the opposition of gentlemen. Our legislature has been accustomed to bring up such propositions for years past, when anything has interrupted the harmony of the country.

When the question of Texas annexation was propounded, did not the Legislature pass resolutions asking Congress to go against it? Certainly. This body has the same right that the Legislature has to declare its views. And if that question were now before Congress, we would have a perfect right to give expression to our views concerning it. Congress would expect it of us; and we should not be acting in good faith towards our constituents if we did not bring our influence to bear upon it. I believe that if we pass these restrictions we shall receive the approval of our constituents generally; though there may be some who will express great contempt for us, and I have no doubt there are such; I mean those who are agitating, those who set themselves up against the law. I have no fear of the contempt of such as these; I court them contempt. They are themselves in a miserable minority. Whenever they can induce a majority to be of their way of thinking then it will be time enough to give attention to the views they put forth, for we should render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. And, sir, gentlemen are asking to be excused from voting! I am astonished that any gentleman here should be afraid to give a free vote—to pour oil on the troubled waters.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to correct the gentleman. I, for one, am not afraid to vote. I am as willing, at the proper time and place, to express my views as the gentleman from Laporte. What I contend for is that this is not the proper place or the proper time for any such expression of opinion.

Mr. TAYLOR. If that were the only cause I think the gentleman would hardly be so solicitous about the matter. He could easily abstain from voting. There must be some cause a little more weighty. I do think that he fears the question from other considerations, and I must be permitted to express what I feel upon this occasion. He has a right to do as he thinks proper about voting, and if —

The PRESIDENT (interrupting), The gentleman has no right to impugn the motives of any delegate.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not impugning the gentleman's motives; only his explanation. [A laugh.] The gentleman must permit me to say that I think he is traveling a little out of the record. The gentleman may sit here and vote upon the question as I should, or he can withdraw from the Hall, and not vote at all; and I am sure that no body would complain. The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) thinks the Convention has no power to make him vote. I differ with the gentleman in that. I think we have the power to require every delegate to vote upon this, or any other question; and if he should prove refractory we could expel him. But the gentleman has asked to be excused from voting, —

Mr. BIDDLE (interrupting). The gentleman is mistaken. I did not ask to be excused. I take it as a right to vote or not to vote, as I please. I am under no obligation to vote. I put it upon the ground of principle—not contumaciously. But I ask it as a right, and shall take it as a right, without any excuse to the Convention. I repeat, it is not of disrespect to the Convention, but I do not choose to sacrifice a principle.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I shall be compelled to vote for the postponement of these resolutions, and the amendments thereto, I feel it to be a duty that I owe to myself to place myself right before the country. And although I never in this Hall, or elsewhere, impugn the motives of gentlemen, like the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) though I never refer to any member as being ignorant as the ass on which he rides; for I look upon such a reference as an insult to the good people of Indiana. Yet if I were compelled to take one horn of the dilemma, I would be almost as willing to be as ignorant as the animal represented by the gentleman, as to bray like him. [Laughter.] I say I impugn the motives of no gentleman, and I permit no gentlemen to impugn my motives, yet I fear my venerable friend from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) in the introduction of these resolutions, has left the path of rectitude, that he has followed all his life. What good object could be attained by introducing these resolutions? What good purpose is to be accomplished by it? It can only serve to fan the flame of excitement on the subject of slavery already lit up in the Union. What does it amount to that can be productive of good to the community? I might go into a discussion of the fugitive slave law.

I might say, as has been said by the gentleman from Switzerland, who is always bold enough to express his opinions, that it is a very high handed measure, to tell the people of Indiana that they shall, on all occasions, whether it be against their consciences or not, yield implicit obedience to the mandates of the South, and be slave-catchers for them. Yet such is the effect of the law. But it is not necessary to go into that subject at this time, or on this occasion. I shall vote in favor of the indefinite postponement of these resolutions, any way; because they are out of place and have no business here.

It has been well remarked by the gentleman from Cass, that this Convention has no power to compel him to vote upon the resolutions; and I have no doubt, sir, of the correctness of that position, for the good reason that the whole subject, and the action of this Convention on it, is a power usurped, not delegated to us by those that sent us here, and not within the range of our duty. Sir, we are sent here with certain specific and delegated powers, for the purpose of framing a Constitution—of making an organic law for the government of the people of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Wayne, Tippecanoe, or Posey, tell me what part of the organic law these resolutions would form, if adopted? Upon what principle would they be obligatory or binding upon the people of Indiana? Would they be published as a part of the organic law that we, the delegates to this Convention, may adopt and send to the people for their ratification, that we, the representatives or the people of Indiana, may establish?

Sir, pass the resolutions, publish them to the world as a part of the action of this Convention, and who will they bind, what binding influence will they have on our courts of justice? Sir, I look at the whole matter as a farce, all out of place; a fire-brand unnecessarily thrown into this Convention. It has been said in this discussion that those resolutions have been introduced for a political purpose, to subserve political designs. Sir, I oppose them on the ground that they are out of place, and foreign from the business for which we have convened in this Hall. I oppose them because no good can be effected by them. Adopt them and what do they amount to? The mere expression of the opinion of this Convention. But after all, will not men think, act, and judge for themselves, regardless of our notions and opinions? Sir, every man will consult his own conscience; think and act for himself. Sir, let the law stand on its own merits; if it is good it does not need our sanction; if bad, it ought not to have it. It ought to take its own course—stand or fall by its own merits. It ought to be obeyed while in force; but if a bad law, it ought to be repealed.

Gentlemen talk about preserving the Union. The Union, they say, must be preserved. I, sir, am as much devoted to the Union as any gentleman upon this floor. But is there anything that is endangering the Union? It has, I believe, sufficient strength, if let alone, to hold together firm and sure on the foundation erected by our fathers. It is held together by bands which I hope and believe can never be burst. But if there is anything that is calculated to weaken those bonds of Union admired by all, and to undermine the great fabric of liberty, it is this nonsensical, demagogical stuff that has been and still is being thrown before the country. Talk to me of dissolving the Union! Sir, if any such danger exists, it is pandering to the disunion excitement now being agitated and talked of by some hot-headed politicians. Sir, if we will patiently wait until the time and occasion for putting the law in force in our own State arrives—if we will first test its operation among our own people—see whether they do not yield implicit obedience to its mandates as good citizens, and not be continually talking about union and disunion, and forbear to get up those inflammatory meetings, it would be far better for all parties concerned. This Union, I believe, is destined to stand for ages by its own strength, if that strength is not impaired by improper excitement. That is my opinion. It has been very properly remarked by the gentleman from Marion, that if we adopt these resolutions and send them to the country, it is but giving importance and strength and encouragement to the Southern portion of the Union, to enforce the execution of this law. Sir, when it becomes necessary—if such necessity should ever exist to speak on this subject—let public meetings be held. I do not want them to be either whig or democratic exclusively, and let them express the popular sentiment in regard to this law, without distinction of party or party feeling. And, sir, if there is any word that I despise as contemptible—if there is any sentiment that I despise when thrown out in this body assembled together as we are to form an organic law—it is the damnable words “whig” and “democrat.” I despise the terms on an occasion so sacred as this. And I would rather see the animal of which the gentleman from Tippecanoe has spoken, come stalking into this Hall, than to hear of whiggery and democracy put out here on this occasion when all should agree. [Applause.]

The best thing that we can do is, to declare to those who are inclined to get up public meetings for the purpose of expressing dissatisfaction with the existing state of things, that this Union stands upon too firm a basis to be endangered by any such proceeding. I will go heart and hand with those who are ready to pronounce by a resolution to be adopted here, that I am for the Union now and forever. But when I am called upon here in the capacity of a delegate, to yield obedience to sentiments with which I do not conclude, are advocated in the proper place or on a proper occasion—when I am called on by the vote that I must give, to tell my constituents, a part of whom I know are honest, and have conscientious scruples, that have their own peculiar views and notions on this subject, that you are not to exercise the right of conscience, that you are to be the inmate of a prison unless you tamely yield to the dictation and interests of others, though in such obedience you may have to sacrifice the religious sentiments of your hearts, you are not to exercise the right of conscience—at this point I stop; I pause.

Believing these resolutions out of place and uncalled for, I shall vote to indefinitely postpone them. I do so that we may proceed with the business of the Convention for which we have been sent here. I want to see them indefinitely postponed—driven from this Hall—condemned to eternal oblivion, where they may sleep the sleep of death forever, and their inflammatory effects withdrawn from the deliberations of this body, and restore in these Halls peace and harmony in the discharge of our important duties.

[Mr. Murray here made some remarks, which are withheld for revision.]

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the motion to indefinitely postpone the consideration of the preamble and resolutions offered by Mr. RARIDEN, and the amendments thereto.

Mr. HOLMAN, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Convention as follows:

If I were actuated, Mr. President, by personal considerations of prudence, it is not likely I would make any remarks on this occasion. This is a question, however, of such a character, as, in my humble judgment, requires that the candid opinion of this Convention should be expressed. It is not a mere question of ordinary politics; it is not a question of secondary importance; but it is a question like this: Is it proper for this Convention, as the immediate delegates of the people of Indiana, to express any opinion on a question involving the integrity of the American Union?

Sir, I am opposed to the indefinite postponement of the question, and I can conceive no impropriety whatever in our now expressing an opinion upon it. The motion under consideration is for its indefinite postponement, and several reasons have been urged in favor of the adoption of that motion. The main reason, however, is this, that the question is one of such a character as ought never to have been brought before us for discussion, and that the motives that brought it here are improper. I care not, Mr. President, what may have been the motives of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) in bringing forward this proposition. I care not whether he was actuated by personal considerations, or by the higher feelings of patriotism. It matters not what the motive may have been, the question is: Is it proper for the Convention to express an opinion upon the subject. For my own part, I regard the gentleman from Wayne, from his long connection with the political history of the State of Indiana—having spent some ten years in her legislative halls, and having been for four years a representative of his district in Congress—as at least familiar with the political history of the country, and his opinions entitled to some consideration. His age, his experience, his long connection with the State, as one of her public servants, and the unabated confidence of his fellow-citizens in his ability and integrity, are all reasons, and strong reasons, too, why his opinions should be entitled to more respect than some gentlemen seem disposed to accord to them. Some gentlemen have gone so far as to say that he was actuated by personal considerations; others have said that this was a mere quarrel between himself and his constituents. The gentleman from Wayne may be influenced by one or all of these considerations, though I do not believe that he is influenced by any of them. I am candidly of opinion that he is influenced by higher and nobler feelings than any such as have been ascribed to him. If the propositions of the gentleman from Wayne are unpopular—and the strenuous opposition with which they have met would indicate that such is the opinion of the gentlemen who oppose them—then, at least, we should accord to that gentleman a high degree of moral courage, if not patriotism, in being willing to sacrifice his favor with the people to a sense of his duty to his country. If, however, gentlemen believe that these propositions will meet the approval of the country, and that the gentleman from Wayne has introduced them to advance his personal popularity, will they oppose what they believe to be the common sentiment of the people?

In matters of mere politics, I differ with the gentleman from Wayne; but every sentiment that he has uttered indicating an attachment to the dearest interests of the country, have met my hearty approval.

The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) tells us that this is a political question, and therefore inappropriate to the deliberations of this body. Sir, what is the question? These resolutions propose to endorse the action of Congress, during the last session, in the general features of those measures which have been regarded as tending to settle the vexed questions which were weakening the ties of affection between the people of the several States of the Union. The gentleman from Allen tells us that this is a political question—a question of party politics. Sir, has it come to this, that a question involving the integrity of the American Union, is a mere political question—a partisan question? that a "Union" party is to be organized, and that it has become necessary, in order to maintain the integrity of this Union, that a party should hoist their standard as a "Union party," and for that purpose to preserve the Union? Sir, the moment that this is to become a party question—a question on which a party is to be organized—from that moment the Union is not worth preserving. [Applause.] Sir, this is not a political question, in the common acceptation of the term. In one sense, it is true, it may be said to be intimately blended with the politics of the country; for it is the foundation on which all our policy is built. And, sir, there is no body of men convened for so high and holy a purpose, as that an expression on their part, favorable to the integrity of the Union, is out of place or inappropriate.

Sir, from the pulpit—from the altar—in the house dedicated to the service of the Most High—such an expression has not only been regarded as proper, but has, in many instances, been given; while the prayers of thousands of united hearts, worshipping in all the fervor of devotion, have ascended to Heaven, asking the aid of the Almighty for the same great end. A political question! A partisan question! A question involving the organization of a party to maintain the integrity of this Union! Sir, as I remarked before, whenever it comes to this—whenever the Ruler of our destinies shall permit us to become so infatuated—whenever it is understood to be a question of this character, and is brought before the American people, with this party for it and that party against it—from that moment, the tie which binds these States together will have been severed.

But gentlemen say that this is not a proper place for the discussion of this subject. Sir, let me inquire who are we? Of whom are the delegates who are here assembled composed? We are a part of the people of the State of Indiana—the representatives of the views and wishes of that people—a part of that people whose destinies hang upon the "Union of the States"—and we have assembled together for what purpose? Why, primarily for the purpose of adopting measures calculated to advance the happiness and prosperity of the State, and incidentally to advance the happiness and prosperity of the people of the whole Union.

One gentleman remarked that the Legislature would soon be in session, and that the question should be considered before that body. Are the members of the Legislature any more the exponents of the will of the people of the State of Indiana than we are? Are they less influenced by party considerations than we, who are supposed to come here destitute of all party considerations? And what time could be more fitting for an expression of opinion on such a subject than the present? If the object for which we are assembled is too high—too holy—to permit us to contemplate a question involving the perpetuity of our glorious republic, let us at once reject these propositions. But, sir, if this is a question involving our interests infinitely above all others—if it is the watch-word of American freedom—then, sir, no place on earth is too sacred—no engagement of life is too exclusive, to claim exemption from its consideration. I care not what may be the expression of the Convention. What do gentlemen desire? If they adopt the patriotic sentiment of the people of Indiana, "that Indiana knows no North, that she knows no South, that she knows nothing but the Union," then am I for it. [Applause.] Or if they adopt the expression of a well known American statesman, "My country—may she ever be right; but right or wrong, my country," then am I also with them. [Renewed applause.]

But, Sir, if these resolutions are to meet the object for which it is said they are designed, they should be a little more definite, and I wish to call the attention of the Convention for a few moments to a substitute which has been offered by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and which the gentleman from Wayne is willing to accept. It has been objected by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) that the following words constituting a part of the preamble to these resolutions are objectionable.

"Whereas certain misguided individuals in this and in other free States," &c. It would perhaps be proper to strike out the words "in this and other free," and substitute the word "various," [Cries of "consent," "consent,"] so that it would read "whereas certain misguided persons in various States," &c. I understand from the gentleman from Posey that he is not only willing, but designed that this amendment should be made.

What then, sir, is the substance of the preamble and resolutions? It is, that Congress actuated by a spirit of concession has adopted that series of measures known as the "compromise measures"—that certain misguided men in various States of the Union, have signified their intention to resist the carrying of those measures, or at least some of them, into effect—that Indiana retains an unwavering attachment to the "Union" and approves of every reasonable compromise necessary to maintain its integrity and that whatever may be the individual opinions of different citizens of this State as to the wisdom or policy of that series of compromise measures, yet inasmuch as they now constitute a part of the law of the land, they should be enforced in good faith.

And then comes this endorsement:

"Therefore, be it resolved, that in the opinion of this Convention, the common sentiments of the people of Indiana sustain and endorse"—

What?

"The general features and intentions."—

Not the minutia—not the details of the fugitive slave law, but "the general features and intentions" of the compromise measures and recognize in their success an earnest of security and perpetuity to our glorious Union."

What was the design of these measures?

Sir, the country has passed through a severe ordeal, only equalled by that in which the Federal Constitution was adopted. The change has been a remarkable one, the "peculiar institution of slavery," has ever been fraught with danger to the Union; every American citizen knows with what unyielding tenacity the slaveholding States have clung to that institution, up to the time of the admission of California into the Confederacy, the States interested in negro slavery either constituted the majority in the Senate of the United States, or held an equal power with the free States; sir, would the South see the "scepter depart from Judea," without a struggle. If California was admitted the South forever lost her ascendancy, other elements of disorganization existed, and Southern and Northern fanaticism had attained such an influence over the deliberations of Congress as, in the avowed opinion of some of our ablest and most experienced statesmen, to seriously threaten the permanency of the Union. Was it not a time for compromise? Shall the Union be endangered because we have forgotten the spirit of concession in which our father's cemented together the elements of this glorious Union.

The occasion was an exciting one, every gentleman knows that, whenever in modern times, the institution of slavery has existed not only in the United States, but elsewhere, the subject has been one of embarrassing interest, the admission of a State on the shores of the Pacific into our confederacy, was of itself a remarkable event, and yet disconnected with other questions of national policy, that event could only have been hailed by the American people as a renewed evidence of the high destiny that awaits us; but connected, as the admission of California was, with a question of such delicacy, that whenever, since the origin of our country, the subject has been approached by Congress; the ablest and most prudent statesman have met it with fearful apprehension, and have even sought to secure safety to the Union by compromise and concession; then, sir, the event became one which loudly demanded the policy that had formed, and the moderation and wisdom that have preserved, "the union of the States."

Then, sir, we propose to endorse the "general features and intentions" of these measures of compromise adopted by Congress to allay the elements of sectional discord and disunion.

The gentlemen who oppose the expression of our opinion, object simply to the details of the fugitive slave law, and to the impropriety of occasion. We do not propose to endorse these details. We simply propose to adopt resolutions in which we can all unite and say that inasmuch as these measures were regarded by Congress as being necessary to preserve the integrity of the Union, and were adopted in a spirit of compromise, therefore the State of Indiana, as one of the free States, is disposed to give them her countenance and endorsement. I would say with the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) that I am opposed to the details of the fugitive slave law. I have no doubt whatever, that during the coming session of Congress that law will be modified. But at the same time let me ask, is the fact that an attempt will be made to procure its modification, any reason why we at this time should not express an opinion as to the general character of the whole of these measures, as "measures of compromise and concession."

But the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, and whose course I must say has generally been consistent, proposes that inasmuch as this measure is one which is not proper for the consideration of this Convention, that therefore he be excused from voting, [A laugh,] and the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) regards this as a revolutionary movement. [Renewed laughter.] Now I presume no gentleman will object to the gentleman from Allen, or from Cass, or from Laporte, or from Switzerland, or from Ripley, who seem to regard this measure with such holy indignation, I say I presume that no gentleman on this floor will object to their being excused from voting. Sir, when it comes to a question of union or disunion we could wish no gentleman to express an opinion unless it comes as a free will offering from his heart.

But, sir, it is said that this is an improper subject for us to consider, because we were sent to this Convention for a specific purpose. Let me ask the Convention, is this the first time that resolutions have been introduced here which had no relevancy to the great object for which the Convention was called together? Have gentlemen forgotten that my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) a few days ago, introduced resolutions in commemoration of the merits of a great American statesman? And who objected to those resolutions? Did the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) rise up and say "this is a very improper subject to be introduced here—the Convention have nothing to do with it—we were called here for a very different purpose?" or did he rise upon his feet and deliver an eloquent eulogy upon the life and character of the lamented Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky? And yet when a question of this vast importance—a question once so dear to the heart of him whose character he eulogized—comes before the Convention, the gentleman from Ripley rises in his place and regards it with such horror that he tells us he will put his VETO upon it—yes, sir, he will put his VETO upon it. Sir, I am opposed to the one man power!

Mr. SMITH, (interposing). Not emphatic. I did not use quite so much emphasis: and if the remark offended the gentleman, I will take it back. ["Hear him, hear him!" and "take it back, then."]

Mr. HOLMAN. But again, sir, the gentleman from Allen regards the question as improper, because it had consumed so much time. Now, I would inquire who is guilty of the consumption of the time of the Convention? Is it that portion of this body who never speak, but are always ready to vote? No, sir. And I would say that as far as voting has been concerned thus far, we have known no distinction between whig or democrat. The gentleman from Decatur was among the first to discover that this was a political question, and he is the only gentleman who has pronounced the two words "whig and democrat," together upon this subject. I remarked that there has been no partisan feeling manifested; and God grant that that day may never come when upon a subject of this character, any partisan feeling shall be exhibited. The gentleman tells us that this subject has consumed a great deal of time, and I ask who is responsible for the consumption of the time? Is it the gentlemen from Allen, Delaware, Laporte, Switzerland, Tippecanoe, Ripley, Cass, and Decatur, who have each discussed this subject on motions for its indefinite postponement, who are opposed to the consumption of time? Is it for my able friend from Ripley whose motion for the indefinite postponement of the subject is now pending, to talk about unnecessary consumption of time, when in the absence of this opposition, not a moment would have been lost in debate?

There are all around me the honest yeomanry of the country, the working men of the Convention, who, without uttering a word upon the subject in the way of discussion, are anxious and willing to vote upon it now; all that we ask is an opportunity to dispose of the question by a direct vote.

Well, sir, this question is pending, and yet gentlemen insist, that instead of meeting it fairly, we must indefinitely postpone its consideration. And why? Because in the first place, the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) introduced it and he is a whig, and in the second place, because this is not the proper place in which to discuss it. Now, sir, suppose we are at home before our constituents, and when asked by them "What is the reason that the Convention did not at once express an opinion on the subject of these compromise measures, when almost every State in the Union in some form or other has expressed an opinion?" "Oh," says my friend from Tippecanoe, "because the question was got up by James Rariden, a whig from Wayne county."

Mr. PETTIT. I didn't say anything of the sort [laughter].

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say you did, but that you might say to your constituents, "It came from an old whig in Wayne county, and therefore it should not be supported." [Laughter.] Why, sir, the honest yeomanry of the country would reply, "Is this the character of the men at the Capital, who cannot spend six weeks together for one of the most important of all purposes, without becoming wild on questions of a party character?" "No, no," say the gentlemen from Wells (Mr. Bascom) and from Ripley (Mr. Smith); "that was not the reason at all; it was simply because that was not the proper place in which to do it." "In the name of common sense," replies the honest man, "what place could possibly be more proper in which to express an attachment for the Union, than that body which might fairly be presumed to be above all political considerations?"

We may differ as to the details of the series of measures, the general features of which are proposed to be approved; and the propriety of bringing the question before this Convention, might, before its introduction, have been a subject for careful scrutiny. Yet, inasmuch as the question is now before us, we will undoubtedly better subserve the interest and credit of the State, by meeting it in a manly spirit; if the general features and intentions of those measures meet, in our judgments, the approval of the people, let us express that approval; if otherwise let the resolutions, by a direct vote, be rejected; but, sir, let honest candor and a just regard for the importance of the subject, forbid an indefinite postponement of the resolutions, and thereby a virtual condemnation of the compromise, which the wisdom of the most experienced statesmen of the nation deemed necessary to allay the feverish excitement then agitating the different portions of the Union; to sustain the general principles of that compromise, I am willing and ready to give my vote.

Sir, is there no resolution we can adopt, no sentiment to be expressed by this body on the subject? or is the North and the South, the East and the West, and every portion of the Union to be advised of the fact that a body of the people of the State of Indiana, drawn together from every county within her borders, were unwilling to give their sanction to those acts of Congress, in their general features, or else that we manifested a decided disapprobation of them, by indefinitely postponing a motion for their approval?

Sir, out of pride for Indiana, that can almost claim to be the keystone State of the Union—out of the honest pride for that State whose able Executive has so eloquently said, and said truly—"Indiana knows no North—no South—nothing but the Union;" out of pride for our people—a people whose attachment to the Union has never wavered, and who fully appreciate its value,—I ask every member on this floor, whether we can consistently evade an expression of our views, and whether we can consistently with the often avowed opinions of the people whom we represent, shrink from responsibility by an indefinite postponement, or avow our disapproval of those measures of compromise, by refusing to adopt, in any form, resolutions expressive of our attachment to that policy which, up to this time, has ever influenced the deliberations of the country.

We do not ask the gentlemen from Delaware, Switzerland, Allen, Ripley, or Decatur, to endorse the details of the fugitive slave law. No, sir; I understand the gentleman who introduced this substitute, (Mr. Owen,) as being opposed to these details; and I also understand the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) as being opposed to them. But the general features of these compromise measures certainly meet the approval of a large majority of the members of this Convention; and I do believe, when it is remembered that these compromise measures were necessary, or apparently necessary, for the integrity of the Union, that not a solitary member of the Convention can object to endorse them.

But, Mr. President, this subject has been approached, to some extent, in rather an improper spirit. It is the expression of the opinion of the people of a great State, that is asked for. Now are we prepared to have the public sentiment affected with the consideration that this Union is of no moment!—that nothing is to be sacrificed to its integrity?—or shall we as citizens, do everything we can do to guard the sanctity of the Union, by ever approaching the subject in the spirit of its importance? It was remarked by one of our most distinguished scholars, the lamented Grimke of South Carolina, that, although the American statesman may discharge every other duty he owes to his country, with the disinterested fidelity of Robert Morris, and the patriotism of Patrick Henry, yet, if he failed to cultivate in the public sentiment, a deep and abiding interest in the integrity of the Union of the States, he would come far short of discharging his duty. Sir, are we prepared, either by approaching this subject in a spirit of indifference, or in that spirit which shows that, as a people, we lay not to heart the importance of this Union—are we prepared to create such a sentiment amongst us as that the sacred words, "American Union," shall become "as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," instead of their continuing to be the watch-word around which the American people may rally, and to which the public mind will cling as the one absorbing and all engrossing subject, as the anchor of hope and the haven of safety? I hope not. Let us, then, adopt some expression of opinion on the subject, no matter what it is, so that it indicates that the State of Indiana is determined to adhere to the Union. Gentlemen say that there is no danger to the country. I do not myself, conceive that there is; but it seems to be apprehended in various parts of the Republic, that there is danger. The names of Webster, and Clay, and Cass, and the opinions which these statesmen express, are entitled to great consideration. These leading spirits, and others, who have watched the current of public events, have declared that there is danger, though we may not apprehend it. Yet, when the question is before this body of men, and the expression of their opinion can be made, certainly it can be no improper time to make it, if only as if renewed expression of our attachment to our country. I hope, sir, that the motion to postpone will be voted down; that the question will be met in a becoming spirit, and that when we go home to our constituents, we may not be compelled to resort to any paltry excuses in endeavoring to palliate our conduct, but that we may be able to meet our people with the bold assurance that will always result from the consciousness of having acted with rectitude, and with a constant desire to promote the public welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. It is at all times more agreeable to my feelings, Mr. President, to sit still and listen to what may be said by others, than to say anything myself; and this is more especially the case when the question under discussion is of as great importance as the present one. I cannot, however, let this opportunity pass by without attempting to say a word in vindication of the vote that I have given, and of the votes that I may yet give on this question.

I much regret that it was thought to be necessary to introduce this matter into the Convention. It appears to me that it would be better for us to attend only to such business as the people sent us here to transact; leaving every extraneous question to be settled elsewhere. I do hope that hereafter nothing will be introduced into the Convention that has not a direct reference to our legitimate business.

This subject, however, whether a proper or an improper matter for this Convention to act upon, is before us; and being before us, the question that presents itself to me is, how ought I under the circumstances of the case to vote? I wish at all times to vote the sentiments of my constituents, and where I am not fully advised of their sentiment, I shall vote for what I believe to be right, and as I have reason to think the people will approve. Whatever may be the action of this Convention on these resolutions, the citizens of our sister States will infer from it the sentiment of the people of Indiana upon the fugitive slave law. The question then is, shall a false inference go abroad from our action here of the sentiment of our people? If we indefinitely postpone the further consideration of this subject, it will be inferred from that act that we done so because we knew that our constituents did not approve of the sentiments contained in these resolutions. It will give occasion to the disturbers of the public peace to point to our State and say, "Indiana will not submit to a law enacted to aid in carrying out a Constitutional provision." Do we wish such an impression to go abroad? For one, I do not! If the opinions of our constituents are to be inferred from our action here, I wish our action to be in harmony with their opinions.

I hold that in the present agitated state of the public mind, the true position of our State on this question is a matter of some importance.

Then, Mr. President, entertaining these views, I believe it to be the duty of every delegate on this floor, to vote on this question as he believes the sentiments of his constituents to be. It is true that I have not heard an expression of the views of my constituents on this subject, but from my acquaintance with them I have no hesitation in saying that they will at all times be found ready to aid in carrying out any law enacted by Congress in harmony with the Constitution; at least, until it can be altered or repealed in a Constitutional way. And I believe that this is the feeling that prevades the breast of a vast majority of the people of our State. Then, as this matter is now before us, why shall we not at once express what we believe to be the sentiment of our State?

I shall, therefore, vote against the indefinite postponement of these resolutions, and hope the Convention will, without delay, adopt them with suitable amendments.

Mr. FOLEY said he did not purpose to vote for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions, because he did not regard them as endorsing the details of the fugitive slave bill. He had no doubt that they were intended merely as an expression of the opinion of the Convention that the people of the State of Indiana were willing to be a law-abiding people, and to give their voice in favor of sustaining the Union. He could not see that the people were bound to obey the fugitive slave law in every particular; but whether or not, he had no doubt that a strong, and he hoped a successful, effort would be made during the present session of Congress to have it so modified as to render it more agreeable to the people to obey it. His friend from Cass county had said that the voice of this Convention would have no more bearing on this subject than the expression of the opinion of any other body of a hundred and fifty men. Probably it might not in the immediate neighborhood of Indianapolis; but their action on this matter would go abroad through the States, and it would have some effect at a distance, if it had but little at home. It would, at any rate, tend to show the country that the people of Indiana were a law-abiding people, and the example of the people so far might have a beneficial effect in other States of the Union. It would, perhaps, have been better if this question had not been mooted here; but it was now before the Convention, and he would be glad to see those resolutions so modified as to result in a unanimous vote in their favor.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. Like many other gentlemen on this floor, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech; I merely wish to make one or two remarks in reference to a question which I think has already occupied too much of the time of this Convention; and I would be willing to dispose of it, and that quickly, in any manner which might be thought to be advantageous to the interests of the State, and to the body of which I am an humble member.

I regret exceedingly that this subject has been introduced here. There have been feelings engendered which I am sorry to see existing in a body of men whose deliberations should be cool, calm, and collected on the most important matters that could possibly convene us together.

Mr. President, whatever may be my final action with regard to the question now immediately before us, it certainly cannot be considered as a representation of the feelings or sentiments of my constituents with regard to it. I alone must assume the responsibility, and I would not wish to have it understood, whatever may be my vote in this Convention, that that vote is to be considered as anything like a representation of the feelings or sentiments of the people whom I have the honor here to represent. The fugitive slave law, although it had passed Congress before I left home, had not elicited much discussion there. We had just heard of its passage; there was no public expression given concerning it, nor have I heard anything with regard to the feelings and sentiments of my people on this subject since I left home. The people whom I represent did not send me here to vote on the fugitive slave law; and I have no hesitation in saying, that were I to canvass the two counties of Lake and Porter, and ask every voter if they expected I should have anything to say upon this subject, they would universally answer "No." They certainly did not send me here to represent them on that subject, and therefore I will not assume the responsibility of doing so.

As I remarked on the outset, I desire that this question should be disposed of as speedily as possible. I am one of those who am not afraid to show my hand, and I am willing to march up to the responsibility. [Applause.] If the Union is in danger I am willing to come up to the subject; but really the idea has been amusing to me, that because a few of the society of Friends in Wayne county—usually a very harmless people—refuse to obey the fugitive slave law, the tocsin of alarm should be sounded that the Union is in danger, and the gentlemen from Wayne and Hancock should rush into the breach, and call upon this Convention to rally round them to sustain the Union flag, lest our whole country, with all its glorious institutions, should go by the board. [Laughter.] It is really amusing to me. If gentlemen want to hold a meeting and have an expression of opinion on this subject, let them hold one to-night after our business is through here, and I am willing to come here and discuss the propriety of saving the Union until midnight—nay, I am willing to spend the whole night in discussing a matter of such importance; but I conceive that it is entirely out of place here while so much important business demands our attention. Sir, the people are becoming impatient to know what will be our action with respect to all the various sections that have been reported by the committees. They conceive that we are spending our time to little purpose, and spending their money without much prospect of benefiting them; and they are very anxiously looking forward to our action. Sir, it is our proper province to discuss those matters which are of primary importance to the State, and to let all other matters go to the people. Let the people of Indiana pass upon the propriety or the impropriety of the fugitive slave law. It is their province to seek for an amendment of that law if they wish it to be amended, or to endorse it if they please to do so. It is not our business, and therefore I protest against this expenditure of time and money on a subject entirely foreign to the business for which we were sent here.

One word in reference to this matter by way of personal explanation. I understand that from various quarters, honorable gentlemen have, out of this Hall, applied to me the opprobrious epithet of abolitionist. I care very little for out-of-door gossip, and perhaps it is rather condescending too much to notice such a charge. All I can say is, that in the common acceptance of the term, I am not an abolitionist; and I can call on members of this Convention, who will testify, if necessary, that the free soil and the old liberty party, in convention assembled, formally nominated another man, who was my opposing candidate, and I suppose they cast their votes for him.

I perfectly disclaim being an abolitionist in the common acceptance of the term; but if an advocacy of human rights makes one an abolitionist, then I am willing to take the odium; and the prayer of my heart shall be, that other gentlemen may bring the opprobrium upon themselves, if an advocacy of human rights would bring it upon them. I fear not to advocate the cause of human rights, if by doing so I will be called an abolitionist.

Having made this personal explanation with regard to my own views on this subject, I shall never again take any further notice of it should it be reiterated within this Hall, but treat it and its author with silent contempt.

I am now perfectly ready to vote on this subject. I am ready to vote for the indefinite postponement; or if the Convention should decline to postpone, and the resolutions should come up for our action upon them, I am ready to vote against the adoption of them. And my reasons for doing so will be simply these: That I believe this preamble and these resolutions set forth matters as facts which never existed as such. They are founded upon false assumptions; and I cannot and will not endorse that which I do not believe to be correct, either in detail or in principle. Hence I am willing to record my vote either for an indefinite postponement, or to lay the resolutions on the table, or anything else, so as to get them out of the way, that we may proceed with the legitimate business for which they were sent here; or if they do come up, and I must vote against the resolutions, I here declare that I heartily record my vote against them, for the reasons I have already assigned; and further, because it is not our business to take into consideration the matters therein involved.

Mr. HAMILTON said: It was with great reluctance that he rose to say a single word on the question now before the Convention. Indeed it was a matter of difficulty for him to speak at any time; and the Convention would bear him witness that in this respect he had not trespassed much upon their attention. As, however, this exciting question had been broached, and as he would be called upon to give his vote upon it, it appeared to him to be necessary to assign some of the reasons for the vote which he would cast.

He would not stay to inquire how these resolutions came before the Convention. It was enough for him to know that they were here, and he was called upon to vote for or against their indefinite postponement.

That there was a spirit of fanaticism abroad creating great excitement and disquietude in various parts of the Union, was admitted on all hands. Meetings had been held in the South for the avowed and openly expressed object of dissolving the union of these States; and on the other hand meetings had been held in the eastern portion of the United States with the declared intention of resisting the laws recently passed by Congress, especially the fugitive slave law, one of those measures which it had been deemed necessary to pass for the purpose of allaying the irritation existing in a large section of the country. He could not say that he had read this fugitive slave law with that degree of attention which a man ought to give to any subject to enable him to speak upon it; but from what he had heard regarding this law, there were many reasons why he could not agree with its provisions. He had not, however, risen to discuss the merits of any of these compromise measures, but to assign his reasons why he should vote against the indefinite postponement of these resolutions. He thought then that the question first to decide was whether any such agitation had existed as that of which these resolutions spoke, and in the next place, if that agitation had had an existence, whether it was proper for the Convention to give any expression of opinion in regard to it. Now it had been urged by some gentlemen in regard to this latter inquiry, that the Convention was not sent here for any such purpose, and that any expression of opinion which might be given could only be regarded as the opinion of a hundred and fifty private individuals which might be counteracted by the contrary expression of opinion by any other like number of individuals. He did not, however, agree with gentleman who entertained this view; but even admitting that opinions expressed by this Convention were to be regarded as the opinions only of so many private individuals, that would have its weight and influence abroad. There were gentlemen on that floor who appeared to ridicule the idea of there being any danger to the Union; whether they were in jest, or whether they were in earnest, was not for him to say. For himself he was neither very superstitious nor very excitable; but he could not but think that when the leading spirits of the day had expressed an opinion that there was danger to the Union, they would not have expressed any such opinion unless they had actually believed it. To think otherwise of them would be to imply that they were either very ignorant of the real state of the country whose destinies were placed in their hands, or very dishonest in the expression of their opinions. (Applause.)

Who are these men? I answer as my friend from Huntington (Mr. Murray) has, and perhaps that gentleman will allow me to say that I never use the term without meaning its full import—who are these men that have intimidated their belief that there was danger to the perpetuity of this Union? Sir, such men as Webster, and Clay, and Cass, would not sound the tocsin of alarm unless they saw real danger ahead. Then, sir, as a citizen of this country, as an adopted citizen, as one who owes much gratitude to your laws and institutions which induced him in early life to emigrate from the land of oppression to the land of freedom—being in the language of the gentleman from Delaware, “a foreigner by birth,” but an American by adoption, I will say to that gentleman that while I may concede to him a higher degree of intelligence than I can boast, I will not concede to him more of moral rectitude or patriotism; and I will tell him further that should this country ever be in danger, and call her citizens to the field, I will not be behind that gentleman in defending her rights. [Applause.] And more, sir, I would tell that gentleman that he may trace the history of this country from the first formation of its government to the present day, and he will not find a single foreigner who has ever proved to be a traitor. Foreigners, sir, have always been among the first to enter your armies when the country called, and why cast any opprobrium upon them because of the fact that they have been born in another land?

Mr. KILGORE. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Allen, but I hope he will allow me a word of explanation.

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the gentleman was not in his seat when I made the remark to which he alludes; and if he was he must have completely misunderstood what I said. In speaking of extending the right of suffrage I most emphatically said that some gentlemen would extend the right of suffrage to foreigners before they had remained long enough in the country to learn to speak the language; that after they had been here but a very short time, knowing nothing either of our institutions or our language, they were considered competent to vote, while the negro who had been here all his life, and had learned no other tongue than ours, was debarred the privilege of voting. At the same time I remarked that while I would vote not to exclude the negro, I would vote to give to the foreigner all the rights which he could enjoy under our government after a very short residence.

Mr. HAMILTON. I thank the gentleman for his explanation, but I take issue with him on his own ground.

What does the gentleman from Delaware say in explanation of his former remarks, which when first delivered were more objectionable than these he now offers in explanation? That he meant foreigners who did not speak our language. Well, sir, who are they to whom he thus alludes. I presume they are principally emigrants from Germany—a country where education is almost universal. How many, sir, from that country, has he or any other gentleman ever known, who have not received the benefit of an education to some considerable extent. To them say in this day of letters, the diffusion of knowledge thrown off by the press, aided by the power of steam, and by that same power diffused throughout the civilized world, that our institutions and the benefits they confer on mankind are unknown, is what I cannot believe. What has caused the countries in the Old World, during the few past years, to be shaken to their very centre, and the thrones of tyrants there to totter. It was the knowledge there possessed of our institutions; their liberality and justness in contrast with their own. And what has experience taught us, and to which I have heretofore incidentally alluded. It is this: The moment a foreigner reaches our shores, whether from France, Germany, or the Green Island, the place of my own nativity, and our country needs his service, does he await to be naturalized, if his adopted country invites him to the field of danger. No, sir, far from it. He at once enters our ranks, rushes to the battle field to fight under the stars and stripes—the flag of the land of his voluntary adoption. Is this not so. Let the plains of Chippewa in the war of 1812, and that of Buena Vista and Mexico, in the recent war, speak. Then, sir, do you not see that the foreign population have much to thank the gentleman from Delaware for, when he places them in the same category with the negro. [Cries of "hear! hear!"] But, sir, this is not the question. I am glad to find that I was in part mistaken as to the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, or rather that he retracts the objectionable part of what he said; for I felt hurt by them.

Then, Mr. President, the question with me is, shall I give my voice in favor of sustaining the laws which have been passed in Congress? I will say, yes, no matter what effect it may have upon me, either now or hereafter, for, sir, I am no politician, nor disposed to seek public honor, nor do I expect ever to be called upon to sit in a deliberative body again. But whenever I am called upon to give my voice in regard to the proceedings which have agitated this glorious confederacy, that voice shall denounce in the strongest terms of which it is capable, every man and every measure who seeks to destroy the union of these States. [Applause.]

Mr. FARROW. I did not intend to say anything upon this subject; but as it appears to be the fashion for every gentleman to "set himself right," and state to the Convention why he votes in a particular manner, I may as well, perhaps, follow the fashion. That, however, is less my object than to make a few suggestions to the Convention; and I would say that I hope the remarks I have to offer will be considered rather in the way of suggestion than in the light of complaint or objection to the course which any gentleman may pursue upon this subject.

I will not, for my own part, undertake to impugn the motives of any gentleman, nor shall I murmur in consideration of the reasons they have urged to induce members to vote upon this subject. I consider that we are manufacturing a kind of two-fold opinion here. We may express an opinion here, and justify our action upon the subject, that may satisfy ourselves here, and our constituents. But it is notoriously true, that what we say and do in this Convention will travel abroad much faster than we have any conception of. At the same time that we are forming a private opinion that may satisfy ourselves on the subject, we are forming a public opinion; and it is that public opinion which we are manufacturing and sending abroad that I wish to look to, when I act upon the resolutions under consideration.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there is a member of this Convention but is now ready, and was ready on the first introduction of these resolutions, without hearing a single word of argument, to vote what he verily believed to be the sense of the people he represents in regard to these measures; and for that reason, I presume that all that has been said in reference to this matter will effect but little good. Then, sir, if we were all ready to vote what we believed to be the views of our respective constituencies, why is it necessary that we should criminate and recriminate each other for the consumption of time in considering a matter that should not have been here at all? I regret much that it should have been broached here; and if there is no way of getting rid of it, except by voting upon it, why is it that gentlemen who are so hostile to this measure will consume the time of the Convention in assigning reasons why they must and will oppose it in every shape?

Sir, the opinion of the Convention of Indiana will be worth just as much abroad as the opinions we receive from Southern meetings and Southern Legislatures, and meetings in different parts of the Union that have been held on this subject; and where is the gentleman on this floor who does not hail with a glad heart every intimation that he receives from any part of the Union that goes to speak favorably of the good opinion of the citizens of the United States upon the subject. Wherever we see that these meetings have been held, and have come to the conclusion that they would stand by the Union, I say that we are altogether disposed to receive such information with cheerfulness and pleasure. And do you not suppose, sir, that there are those who have as great a regard for the Union as we have, who will receive our expression of fidelity to the Union with as much pleasure as we do theirs? Unquestionably they will; and one good effect of such an expression will be to encourage our fellow-citizens abroad to stand fast in the faith in which we believe. I should like to know, then, why gentlemen frame so many excuses for not coming up to this matter? It will be but an expression of the opinion of the people forming the Convention of the State of Indiana, and, to some extent, the opinion of the people of the State; and, for my part, I am ready to express before this Convention, by my vote, what I believe to be the sentiments of the people I represent. [Applause.]

Mr. WATTS. I did not expect to say anything whatever upon this subject, and it is not my intention to say more than a very few words at this time. I voted to lay these resolutions on the table, because I thought that this was an inappropriate place for them. I voted against taking them from the table, and I shall vote for their indefinite postponement. Notwithstanding all that, Mr. President, I profess to be as much attached to the Union of this government as any other gentleman on this floor can be. But, sir, judging of this matter as best I am able, from the little experience I have had in my life, I am far from believing that a few Quakers in the county of Wayne, who, by the way, are usually a very quiet and harmless set of people, will ever dissolve this Union. They are good, and quiet, and peaceable citizens. But, sir, if this Union is dissolved, it will not be a bloodless dissolution, and I believe the Quakers never fight. [Laughter.] In addition to that, Mr. President, I cannot believe that the blood of our Revolutionary fathers has got so pale and so cold in our veins that this Union is in danger yet. I am quite of opinion, sir, that we may live a few generations longer before it will be in danger.

But it is said that we ought to express an opinion here. Now, I am as willing to express an opinion as any man upon this floor, on any legitimate subject which this Convention can act upon; but if you bring matters before this Convention which do not legitimately belong to the business we came here to transact, then I am not bound to vote for them. That is the position that I occupy. We were sent here for a specific purpose; and I am disposed to vote upon every question appertaining to that purpose; and more than that, sir, I am disposed to hurl everything from this Convention which we ought not to act upon. [Consent! consent!]

These are my sentiments, and I have no fear for the Union—no apprehension whatever that a dissolution is going to take place. I find, sir, that, whenever our country is likely to be in difficulty, or in danger of being invaded, every class of the community, in every region of the country, is ready to rally in support of her standard, and defend her rights and privileges at the peril of their lives, unless it be my friends, the Quakers, who, I believe, are as good, and honest, and patriotic—with the exception that they won't fight, and that belongs to their religious creed—as any of us; and I have no objection to them on that account. Sir, I have no fear whatever that a few Friends or Quakers in Wayne county are going to stir up such a difficulty in this Government as to dissolve the Union. I shall, therefore, vote for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions, so that we may proceed with our regular business. ["Consent! consent!"]

Mr. MATHER. I do not rise to set myself right in this House, as is in the habit of being remarked by many gentlemen, because I do not conceive that on this subject, I have yet been wrong. It is a thing frequently heard from members on this floor, that they stand pledged to do this or that before their constituents, or that they are instructed by their constituents to do some particular thing. Now, if there is any one thing on which I feel instructed by my constituents as to my action in this body, it is that no act or vote of mine shall be given to raise party issues and party strife in this House. This is a subject on which I feel especially pledged. I come here a whig, representing a democratic district. And it is more than probable that had my democratic friends supposed that I was coming here with the view of representing any political views they would not have voted for me; and I do not, therefore, feel at liberty to give a political vote. I cannot look upon this question in any other light than as a political question, and for the reason that I had determined that no act of mine in this Hall should by any possibility be construed as having any political bearing in it. I have voted to lay the original proposition upon the table, and have voted to keep it there; and I shall now vote for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions.

And, Mr. President, let me here remark, that because I have done this, I wish no man to say that my fidelity to the Union is less than his. Whenever the Union is in real danger from any cause, I shall be as ready as any man upon this floor to exert my feeble efforts to sustain it. But can it be said by any gentleman that by the passage of these resolutions, the Union can be held together one single hour! Where is the utility of passing resolutions of this kind? Is there any gentleman who seriously believes that the Union can be preserved by the passage of these resolutions? No, sir; the Union needs no such support; it rests upon a more secure basis than upon such paltry stuff as this—it rests in the hearts of the masses of the people. An expression of opinion or of feeling from that source might be entitled to some regard; but an expression of opinion from a body of this nature, organized for purposes entirely foreign to this, is entitled to no greater weight in any quarter of the Union, than an expression from any other one hundred and fifty men. I think it is out of place here.

And, sir, I deny that a majority of the members upon this floor have any right to say to me that I shall express my opinion upon this subject, pro or con. I coincide fully with the views of the gentleman from Cass. I assert, sir, that they have no right to do it; and should I wish to persist in my rights, and sit quietly in my seat when the vote is taken, no power in this Convention shall say to me that I shall express an opinion on a subject for which my constituents never sent me here, and for the expression of which I would not be responsible to them.

Mr. COATS. I regret very much, Mr. President, that so much time has been spent upon this subject, and I hope that we may now come to a direct vote for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the Convention.

From the range which this discussion has taken, it appears that we are called upon to say whether the State of Indiana is in favor of the perpetuity of the Union. Sir, it would be no compliment for me to say by my vote that my constituents are in favor of the Union, for I declare that they are all in favor of it, of which many of them have given the most ample demonstrations.

But I have another reason why we ought to put a stop to this discussion and proceed with the business which we were sent here to perform—namely, to revise the Constitution. We have been sent here for a specific purpose. According to the act of the General Assembly, we are sent here to revise the Constitution, which is to be submitted to the people for their approval when the work is completed. Now, let me ask, is this an appropriate subject with which to spend our time, and incur thereby an enormous expense to the State? I protest against it. Hence I thought it advisable to make the motion which I did, and I hope no gentleman will take offense at the motion I made, for I was influenced by the best of motives to do so. I trust, therefore, if it meets with the approbation of the Convention, that this subject will be indefinitely postponed, in order that we may proceed with the ordinary business for which we are assembled here.

[Loud cries of "question!" "question!" "question!"]

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) desires to be excused from voting on this subject. Will the Convention excuse the gentleman?

VOICES. "Consent, consent."

Mr. BORDEN. Only on the direct vote. However, when the question on the resolutions comes up, I will attend to that matter for myself.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that as there is an imperative rule on this subject, gentlemen will do well to consult it. Although we have such a rule, it appears to me that it is not within the power of the Convention to make a man vote. Indeed, it is difficult to make a man do anything. Gentlemen undoubtedly remember the old saying, the moral of which is good—that it is an easy matter to take a horse to the water; but a very difficult thing to make him drink. [A laugh.] We have a rule which says, "Every member who shall be in the Convention when the question is put, shall give his vote, unless the Convention for special reasons shall excuse him. And should any member present not excused from voting; refuse to vote when his name is called, the President shall direct the Secretary to make an entry on the journal that said member was present and called, but refused to vote."

Mr. COATS moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the motion to indefinitely postpone the preamble and resolutions, and were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Hardin, Hawkins, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Mather, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Mower, Newman, Niles, Pettit, Ritchey, Robinson, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Barbour, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chenoweth, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Frisbie, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—76.

So the motion to postpone the resolutions was not agreed to.

Mr. McFARLAND. It must be apparent to every gentleman on this floor that it would be proper to pass this proposition either in its present form or in some other form. This, sir, is certainly a very important question, and if it be an important question, is it not due to this Convention that it should be put into such a shape as to secure, if possible, something approximating to unanimity in the expression of our sentiments? It must be apparent that there will be a large minority, too, that will vote against these resolutions in their present form. Sir, I fear that the expression of the opinion of the Convention on this subject, instead of being calculated to allay excitement in the East and elsewhere, will tend much to its increase. Is it not then incumbent upon us—

Mr. FOSTER (interposing). I would ask, Mr. President, if the previous question is not in force?

The PRESIDENT. No; it is exhausted.

Mr. McFARLAND. I will say to the friends of the proposition in true faith that if they will bring in a compromise proposition that shall endorse the compromise measures I will be with them. But, at the same time, if these resolutions are passed to a vote I shall record my vote against them with as good an appetite as I ever did anything in my life. I admit the Constitutional obligation upon us as a State to deliver up fugitives from service; but while I admit that, I admit that the present fugitive slave law needs amendment, and that in its present shape I cannot and will not endorse it under any circumstances. Now what I ask of the friends of the proposition is that it should go into the hands of a committee, that it may be arranged in such a way that we may all agree upon it. Can that not be done? Is it not due to ourselves? Is it not due to the question? Is it not due to the other States of the Union that we should act with deliberation on this question? I believe that it is; and believing that it is, and hoping that the Convention will concur with me in that opinion, I will move that it be referred to a select committee of one from each Congressional District. [Loud cries of "no, no, no, no."]]

Mr. OWEN. The Convention is aware that the motion to commit has already been made. I voted for the motion to commit in the hope that it might go to a committee and no more time be lost here. But the Convention has already refused to do this.

Now at this stage of the proceedings I would inquire of the Chair whether I have control of the motion made by myself to strike out the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne and substitute those which I read?

Mr. KELSO would ask whether the gentleman from Wayne did not accept them as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT was understood to say that the resolutions were in the hands of the Convention and could not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. OWEN. Then I would say to the Convention that there has happened to me in this case what has usually happened when I have listened to any debate in this Convention—I have learned something from it. An objection was made to the resolutions introduced by me which seemed to be a good objection—that while these resolutions condemn insubordination to the law, they could not, in any sense, be understood to apply to an insubordination equally to be deprecated, which shows itself in the South; that if, in the North, the fugitive slave law was said to be a bad law, in the South there had been some discontent and disorganization in reference to the admission of California.

Now in these resolutions which I would wish to offer as a substitute, there are no elaborate protestations of allegiance, for I consider such protestations at all times as a doubtful matter; very much like a man assuring the world that he is exceedingly honest. They contain no assertion that the Union is in danger—they contain no endorsement of any compromise measures—neither of the fugitive slave law nor of any other—nor is there any special reference to the North or the South—the free or the slave States, and they condemn equally disobedience to the laws of the land, let it come from what quarter it may. Now if the Convention is disposed to pass any series of resolutions, perhaps these would be liable to as few objections as any could be, considering the hasty manner in which they were drawn up.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. McFarland) that his motion to commit the resolutions is not in order, a motion to that effect having been made and decided upon by the Convention the same day.

Mr. OWEN. I will withdraw my resolutions which were accepted by the gentleman from Wayne as a substitute for his, and offer these instead:

WHEREAS, the Congress of the United States passed, at its last session, a series of acts, commonly called the compromise measures; and WHEREAS, certain misguided individuals in various States of the Union, have expressed their determination to resist a portion of its laws; therefore, be it

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the common sentiment of the people of Indiana sustains and endorses, in their general features and intentions, the said series of compromise measures, as passed by Congress; and recognizes in the success of these measures, an earnest of security and perpetuity to our glorious Union.

Resolved, That whatever may be the opinion of individuals, as to the wisdom or policy of the details of one or any of the acts of Congress above referred to, it is the duty of all good citizens to conform to their requisitions; and to carry out, in good faith, the conditions of that compromise on the subject of domestic slavery, which is coeval with the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be transmitted to the Governor of each State and Territory of the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. WALLACE. The gentleman from Posey cannot withdraw his resolutions, for I believe they were accepted by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden).

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Wayne could not accept them. He had no right to do so.

Mr. RARIDEN. I am very glad I did not accept them, for I do not like them half so well as my own.

Mr. KELSO. I have an amendment to offer, which I wish to be appended to the last resolution but one. It is this:

"Provided, however, that nothing in the foregoing preamble and resolutions, shall be considered as instructions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to vote in opposition to proper and wholesome amendments to the fugitive slave law."

Mr. NAVE. I very much doubt the propriety of that amendment, and therefore I move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. KELSO. And I as sincerely doubt the gentleman's judgment in the matter.

The yeas and nays being ordered and taken, on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, resulted as follows—yeas 57, nays 68:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Taylor, Terry, Walpole, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—57.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Howe, Johnson, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—68.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered to Mr. Owen's resolution by Mr. Kelso, and it was rejected.

Mr. COLFAX remarked, that like many other members who had spoken, he considered these resolutions as out of place in this body. We were sent here for a distinct and specific purpose, and specially warned by our constituents to avoid all discussions which might engender any party feeling. We have certainly not any too much time for the duties which appropriately devolve on us, to justify us in turning aside to discuss or to settle National questions. But if the Convention are determined to consider and adopt resolutions on the subject of the alleged opposition of misguided persons to the laws of the Nation, and expressive of their opinion as to Congressional laws, he had a few amendatory resolutions which he desired to propose. There has been a great deal said, and a great deal of indignation leveled at certain Northern agitators, which the resolutions as originally introduced, were specially intended to denounce. But there has been very little said about Southern agitators, whose action imperils the Union, if its continuance is at all in danger. The Union, sir, is in no danger; but if its preservation is threatened, the treason which perils it, is not in this State, or in this portion of the Union. The North always submits to, if she does not endorse or approve, the legislation of Congress, even when it is most repulsive to her. And instead of nullifying, the North seeks only to rid herself of the operations of unjust and oppressive laws, by constitutional and legal means.

It is therefore to draw the attention of the Convention to this fact, and to enable them, if they desire to rebuke treason, to rebuke it where it is really rife, that I offer the following resolutions as an amendment to the amendment :

Resolved, That notwithstanding personal opinions as to the propriety or impropriety of the recent measures of Congress, they should be submitted to, as long as they exist as laws, as the supremacy of the laws is the only means of preserving our Government from anarchy and destruction; and that we disapprove of any attempts, by force or violence, to resist the execution of the laws.

Resolved, That this Convention most decidedly disapprove of the treasonable threats and acts of the State of Texas during the last year, in its defiance of the powers of the General Government, and its declaration that it would defy the authority of that Government even to arms.

Resolved, That we do as sternly disapprove of the conduct of South Carolina, after she had imprisoned citizens of other States of this Union, in expelling with obloquy and contempt an agent of a sovereign State, who only asked, in peace and quietness, the privilege of testing before her own courts, the question whether such laws are or are not in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That we do even more sternly disapprove of the factious course of Southern agitators, who, not content with passing resolutions in town or county meetings, have, within a month past, held a Southern Convention, composed of delegates from sovereign States, at which the most treasonable intentions were avowed—and the authority of the Union openly sneered at and defied.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the amendment be laid on the table;

And the yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered,

The motion was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Barbour, Bascom, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—87.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beard, Biddle, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Garvin, Hawkins, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Mather, May, McFarland, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Newman, Niles, Ritchey, Smith of Ripley, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, and Work—39.

Mr. HOLMAN offered the following amendment to the resolutions offered by Mr. Owen :

“Provided, that there is intended in this expression of opinion, no instructions whatever, to our present Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I hope I may be indulged with a single remark; I will not exceed a minute. In the first place I would remark upon the manner in which the gentleman from Posey introduced his resolutions. He took about five minutes to explain to the Convention that they meant nothing at all. I understood that they were intended as a rebuke to some of the rebellious people in the State of Indiana, or in some of the Northern or Southern States; but I could not locate them. But, from voting, and very recent voting, too, I have come to the conclusion that although they are not intended to rebuke treason, even though it walked in mid-day among us—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Ripley that the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). [Cries of “hear him,” “hear him.”]

Mr. SMITH. I would like to know what the amendment is then, [laughter,] for I thought I was speaking to it.

The amendment was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. SMITH. I take it that any member speaking, is entitled to express his views in the best way that he can [“hear, hear”]. If I cannot come directly to the point, it is just because there is no definite point in my head, [laughter,] and in that respect I am just like the resolution. I require, therefore, a kind of locomotion to get it out, so that I may strike out a point, as there might be a point in the resolutions after a while. But I am sure they were introduced by a speech to show that there was no point in them, and if they were intended to rebuke treason, as I infer from the wording of them, the gentleman makes it appear that there is no treason. By a solemn vote the Convention has said that there is no treason except in Indiana. They may, perhaps, come to locate the treason in Wayne county after a while. They will find, perhaps, that there are a few persons there in a lone school house, or a meeting house, or in an outhouse, or in a barn, or, perhaps, in the woods, who have spoken some hard things against the fugitive slave law. Now, Mr. President, I submit that that does not amount to treason by any means. I think, sir, that as this is not intended as an instruction to any person as any evidence of the vote of this Convention, as intended to do or mean anything, it is altogether proper and important that it should be put in such a shape as to have some meaning in it. Finding that these resolutions mean nothing, and that there is no treason, I now move that the whole matter be indefinitely postponed, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. BORDEN. The motion is for an indefinite postponement, and I think the Convention had better do this, and go to work with the business before them. I wish my friend from Posey to tell me what I am voting for. He has drawn up these resolutions, and introduced them here, and I wish to vote understandingly. I want to ask him this question, whether he means to say by his resolutions, that one foot of the territory on the upper Rio Grande ever belonged to the State of Texas?

[Cries of "question, question,—order, order,—hear him, hear him," and much confusion, during which the President declared the Convention to be adjourned until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.]

SPEECHES OF MESSRS. RITCHEY AND OWEN,
On "Banks and Internal Improvements," delivered,
Thursday morning, Nov. 21, 1850.

Mr. RITCHEY said, it appeared to him that some gentlemen had a strange idea of the question before them. It was contended by some, that the Convention had no right to say that the people hereafter, should not have the power to vote themselves in debt. If that doctrine were true it would imply that there was no necessity for holding the Convention at all. It was proposed, in framing a new Constitution, to make many restrictions, but these restrictions were not imposed by the Convention, but by the people themselves. Did any one suppose that the Constitution which they were now framing, if adopted by the people, would last only a few years? I admit, sir, continued Mr. R., that if the Convention does its business in a bungling manner, it probably will not. But I think it should be the desire of every member, to frame such a Constitution as will be acceptable to the people of the State, and will last forever.

The Constitution embodies the restrictions which the people impose upon themselves and the Legislature, which is only the executor of their will. And this Constitution, when adopted, with all its restrictions is but the act of the people themselves. For, although this body is dignified with the name of Constitutional Convention, yet they are to be looked upon in no other light than a great committee, raised by the people, to prepare and submit propositions for their approval in their sovereign capacity.

And if the people, after bringing themselves under these restrictions, shall wish to contract a debt, for any purpose not specified, they can do so by calling another Convention, or by amending the Constitution in any other mode which may be prescribed.

Since 1841, a majority of the people have been of the opinion that the Legislature should not have the power to involve the State in debt, and this feeling, since that period, has been constantly increasing, as we have felt more and more the intolerable burthens of the debt which is now hanging over us.

And if this Convention shall determine that any debt can hereafter be contracted, such action will be a retrograde movement; for no question has ever been more distinctly decided by the people; and yet, gentlemen propose to insert in the Constitution a proposition, by which we may again be involved in debt.

We are told by gentlemen, that if the proposition reported by the committee, of which he is a member, and which, in his absence, had made their report, had been in force in 1836, the people would never have been involved in the debt, which now hangs over them. Sir, I take a different view of the subject. I have never heard any man charged with being concerned in the introduction of the iniquitous system of internal improvements, who did not attempt to throw off the responsibility from his own shoulders, and place it upon the people. As the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) had stated, the survey bill was the commencement of this great system.

There had been great misrepresentation as to the cost of the works proposed, and the people had been deceived both as to the cost of the works, and as to their ability to complete the system without taxation. Under these false impressions in deciding at the ballot-box in favor of the advocates of the system, and the simultaneous prosecution of the works, they indorsed the proceeding, and took upon themselves the responsibility. The people were deceived by the politicians of that day—and did any gentleman suppose that, by such statements and misrepresentations, they might not be again deceived? He had no doubt they might be again misled, and for that very reason no Legislature should have the Constitutional power to involve the people in any such difficulties and embarrassment hereafter. The question should be settled at once. He hoped the naked question would be put, whether we shall submit this proposition to the people of Indiana—Are you willing to invest any future Legislature with the power of involving the State in a debt, for any other purpose than those enumerated in the preceding section?

He desired to have a direct vote upon this important proposition.

Mr. OWEN. I rise for the purpose of bearing witness to the truth of what has been said by the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) and what was previously stated by the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) in regard to the Internal Improvement system, of 1836. I claim to know something about this matter; for, though not in the Legislature the year the internal improvement bill passed, I was a member for three years immediately succeeding its passage.

I differ in opinion with my young colleague from Posey, (Mr. Hovey,) who, at that time—it is some fourteen years ago—was not of an age to give much attention to political affairs, or to participate in the discussion of this particular matter.

It is my settled conviction, sir, that, at that period, if the Legislature, after deciding to engage in a system of internal improvement, after all the stirring speeches made in its favor; after the various appeals through the newspapers; after all the reports made by engineers—and most wild and unreliable reports they were—if, I say, after all these stimulants, the question had been submitted to the judgment of the people, I am satisfied that a majority of them would have decided wrong. Moved by the excitement of the day, and misled by fallacious estimates, they would have involved the State in the very same debt with which she is now burdened.

The proof of this assertion is to be found in the fact that those members of the Legislature who voted for the “mammoth bill,” almost without an exception, obtained a re-election. Their proceedings were thus approved, their course endorsed by the people.

If there be a wholesome Constitutional restriction, this bar to the increase of a public debt in the future, surely is one. To the argument that all such restrictions are but an imposing of chains on the people, the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) has already replied. He has well said, that, if we are to strike from the Constitution all provisions that are restrictive, there will remain hardly anything, but a single section, declaring that there shall be a Legislature; and to that Legislature everything will be left.

The same gentleman just touched the point, that, if such were our action, we should be following the example of England. That is undoubtedly true. Great Britain has no written Constitution. She has certain great principles of government, venerable for their antiquity and made permanent by a settled public opinion; but there is no organic law in which these are embodied. Parliament may be said to be omnipotent. No law passed by parliament can be rescinded by the courts, as unconstitutional. Such great guards to liberty as the right of trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, and others, have no permanency, except that which public sentiment gives them. They might legally be stricken from England's statutes by the action of Parliament.

This is one great point of difference between our political system and that of most European nations. We restrict ourselves by an enduring Constitution. We say, that, contrary to the restrictive provisions of that Constitution, no laws shall be passed. England and other monarchies vest in their national legislatures unlimited power.

In this, I think our system is much better than theirs. And, perhaps, in our case—wherever there is popular and not kingly sovereignty—a written Constitution is more necessary than it is in a monarchy. The chief evil in an old monarchy, is non-progressive conservatism. The chief danger, in a popular government, is from hasty impulse. A written Constitution is a check on this hasty impulse. It affords time for the action of that “sober second thought,” which, among a free people, almost always decides right.

But, if we agree to have a written Constitution at all, I know of no more safe or necessary restriction that can find place on its pages, than this, prohibitory of a vast public debt.

TUESDAY, DEC. 3, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. GOODE.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the resolutions in relation to the compromise measures of the last session of Congress.

The pending question being upon the proviso moved by the gentleman from Dearborn,

Mr. RARIDEN rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN (also rising). I have the floor, I believe, this morning.

Mr. RARIDEN. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, I have a proposition to make regarding the journal, and I think the gentleman from Elkhart, over the way, will agree to it, because I think that when the excitement of the moment has passed away, he will look with regret at the motion that he made yesterday. I move to erase from the journal, the amendment which the gentleman offered to my resolutions, and everything that pertains to it.

Mr. COLFAX. That would be mutilating the record.

Mr. BORDEN. I yield for the motion of the gentleman, but do not surrender my right to the floor.

The question was taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, to expunge the amendment from the journal, and it was not agreed to.

[Mr. BORDEN here made some remarks, which he has out for revision.]

Mr. READ of Monroe.—

MR. PRESIDENT: I will read a certain paper which I have drawn up, as expressing the sentiments on this subject, which I would gladly see adopted by the Convention, and should it be evident that it expresses the feelings of nine-tenths of this body, I will, if an occasion arises in the course of our proceedings, when it will be consistent with parliamentary order, offer it for adoption.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the United States, at its late session, passed a series of acts designed to allay the dissensions and angry feelings which threatened the harmony, if not the destruction of our glorious Union; and whereas, certain misguided persons in various States, have expressed a determination to resist the laws, and keep up the agitations which have wrought so much mischief in our country;

The Constitutional Convention of this State, now in session, in behalf of the people whom they represent in the highest act of their sovereignty, deem it not unworthy the solemnity of the occasion on which they are assembled, to DECLARE,

1. That the people of Indiana are a law-abiding people, and that whatever may be the opinion of individuals as to the justice or policy, in all their details, of any one or more of the acts referred to; as a people they will maintain, in all good faith, the supremacy of the law, and discountenance and put down factious opposition thereto.

2. That Indiana, from her geographical position, her commercial relations, her population, commingled from all the States of the confederacy, is, in sentiment and interest, bound in ties indissoluble, equally to the States North and South. In feelings of brotherhood, Indiana knows no North—no South—nothing but the Union.

3. That, not only is the common sentiment of the people of Indiana for the Union, but equally for that compromise contained in the federal Constitution, upon which the Union itself is based; and that in the compromises and concessions which, at every period of difficulty in our past history, have been brought about by the great and good of our statesmen, they see the earnest of security and perpetuity to our free and happy institutions.

MR. KENT. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make a speech, nor, in the language of many gentlemen, to “set myself right before my people,” but to express my disapprobation of the introduction, into this Convention, of the preamble and resolutions under discussion.

As a pretext why this body should entertain this question, we have been told by gentlemen that the Union is in danger—that already a portion of the South have expressed their determination to dismember the Union of these States, and that an expression of our attachment to the perpetuity of this glorious Republic, will nerve the hearts of the Union men of the South, and have a powerful tendency to calm the raging political tempest produced by the two extreme factionists of the country.

Now, sir, I do not believe the integrity of the Union is in danger. It cannot be that one hundred thousand slaveholders, (and that is the estimated number in the United States,) if united, could, with the co-operation of the abolitionists of the North, dissolve the Union. But, it is not the slave holders, as a body, nor the honest, but misguided abolitionists, who are disturbing the peace of this great nation. No. But it is those among these classes, whose love of office is greater than their devotion to the Union; and who, in consequence of this treasonable desire for distinction, have lost their influence in the great political parties of the country. To these impious aspirants for fame, should the curse of this and future generations be awarded, for the evils and dangers alluded to by gentlemen, but which, in my estimation, are generally exaggerated.

In the heat of debate gentlemen have imagined that the days of the Republic were numbered, and that the pillars of this mighty political fabric, were already crumbling to pieces. The gentleman from Orange (Mr. Sherrod) seemed to feel the appalling pressure of a dismemberment of the States weighing heavily upon him; and hence his earnest and eloquent appeals to save the Union. Several other gentlemen were equally impressed with the near approach of the final termination of this wide spread confederacy, in blood and carnage. And, as if by a special interposition of Providence on behalf of those who are greatly troubled in spirit at the impending calamity of dissolution, and to relieve them from these fearful apprehensions, the cheering news, with lightning speed, reaches us that the Union ticket in Georgia, has succeeded by over THIRTY THOUSAND majority.

Now, Mr. President, would it not be well for gentlemen to inquire, for a moment, the object of this Convention? If my memory is not at fault the Legislature at its session of 1848 and 1849, passed an act to provide for taking the sense of the qualified voters of the State, on the propriety of calling a Convention to alter, amend, or revise the Constitution of Indiana; and that, at the succeeding August election, a large majority of all the votes given, was in favor of calling said Convention. And, it will be recollected, at least by those who are not apprehensive of the immediate dissolution of the Union, that the Legislature of last year, provided for carrying this expressed public will of the people into effect; and that in pursuance of this last noticed act, the electors of Indiana, at the last general election, selected one hundred and fifty Delegates to alter, amend, or revise the Constitution of the State.

Now, sir, I would suggest, that the further consideration of the subject of the Union of these States, be postponed until the 8th of January next; and that the Delegates of this Convention, as citizens of the State of Indiana, recommend a meeting in this Hall on the 8th day of January, 1851, for the purpose of expressing their sentiments upon the compromise measures of the last session of Congress, and, if you please, of their great devotion to the perpetuity of this glorious confederacy of sovereign States.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not myself have introduced these resolutions, but, inasmuch as they are introduced, I am willing to meet responsibility so far as to give my vote decidedly in favor of them. Gentlemen on all sides appear to have resolutions prepared which they intend to submit at the proper time. I apprehend, sir, that time will never arrive. Some gentlemen have intimated that they think the Convention has nothing to do with this matter—that it is interfering with a matter that does not belong to us. Sir, the Legislature has been constantly in the habit of interfering, as gentlemen will have it, in national affairs, and why should not this Convention, which is a more immediate emanation from the people? Why should we not be permitted to express our opinion in our collective capacity as a Convention, occupying, as we do, a position a great deal higher than that of any other deliberative body that has ever met in this State? Why we should not express our opinion, I am really at a loss to know. Other deliberative bodies have done so, and I feel convinced that an expression of the opinion of this Convention will carry with it more force than an expression of opinion on the part of any public meeting of the people of any one county to be assembled, as has been proposed by a gentleman, on the 8th of January next. And, by-the-by, I am inclined to think that that day, a day ever memorable in the annals of this country, has been prostituted most outrageously by other purposes than those of patriotism. It seems to be the prevailing idea that the day will cover all defects. But I am not one to be influenced by such considerations.

These resolutions, Mr. President, are here, and I intend to vote for them. I shall not enter upon an examination of the subject of the settlement of the boundary of Texas. It is not german to our purpose. But I am prepared to show that Texas had a claim to all the territory laying on this side of the Rio Grande, including Santa Fe. We find it so recognized, not only in the treaty with Santa Anna and in the act of the Congress of Texas, but in the proclamation of Gen. Bravo, declaring certain pains and penalties against all Mexicans who continued on this side of the Rio Grande, and declaring that they should be considered traitors. That is, in my estimation, a sufficient answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Allen, regarding the claim of Texas.

One gentleman, the other day, not quite so well posted up as he thought he was, intimated that gentlemen here were as ignorant as the asses they rode to get here. Some people had better take the beam out of their own eyes before they attempt to remove the mote from ours, and then they will be better enabled to see what they are doing. Sir, I am tired of this assumption of gentlemen on this floor to thrust down our throats and compel us to swallow everything they choose to give us. For my part, I have always thought for myself, and intend to do so on this occasion. Some gentlemen over the way, I do not intend to impugn their motives, but they all sing the same song, declare that this is not the proper time for the introduction of these resolutions. They are for holding a public meeting at the Court House, or in the Supreme Court Room in this Capitol, and adopting resolutions as private citizens, and not in our character as delegates to this Convention. Well, sir, there is but little responsibility attaching to any one in a public meeting composed of four or five hundred persons. Perhaps you will see the names of the chairman and secretary announced, but who votes for the propositions that may be adopted at such meeting nobody knows. But when we come here as delegates for the people, and when we solemnly—I use the word “solemnly,” because the occasion is solemn—when we solemnly declare our adherence to the Union, and frown indignantly on fanatics, when we declare that Indiana, in language that has been used here, “knows no North, no South—nothing but the Union,” it will have a good effect, not only on the people of this State, but throughout the Union.

Sir, Indiana is not now what she was some years ago. Thirty years ago she was a territory; now she contains a million of inhabitants—a State of the fifth rank in resources, in population, and in wealth.

A VOICE. In population, not in wealth.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, let that be as it may, it is the fourth or fifth State in the Union. Shall it be said that the voice of Indiana shall not be heard in respect to matters that concern the whole Union?

From the uniform and moderate course which Indiana has heretofore pursued, her voice will be heard and regarded, and I hope that every gentleman on this occasion, whatever his political views may be, whatever his views in relation to this matter may be, however he may differ with other gentlemen in regard to these laws, yet as they were formed as compromise measures for the benefit of the Union, I trust he will support them. Is it to be supposed, sir, that when such men as Clay, and Cass, and Webster, and Foote, and Dickenson, have united their energies for the purpose of producing such measures as were calculated to promote the best interests of the country, is it to be supposed, I say, that there was no need of compromises? Yet gentlemen say there has been no danger of disunion. Why, sir, these very compromise measures were under consideration for nine months, and until recently we never heard the word treason uttered; but now people assembled in public meetings make declarations with impunity which a few years ago would have been scouted and trampled under foot. Why, sir, they out-Herod Herod. They boldly avow doctrines such as characterized the Hartford Convention. Gentlemen are mistaken; they may sing the syren song of peace, peace—but there is no peace. I tell you that danger is lowering, and that it will burst upon us with tremendous force by and by, if we do not take the proper course to allay excitement. I believe that the adoption of these resolutions will have considerable effect to allay excitement, and I shall vote for them under almost any shape that they can assume.

Mr. BASCOM. I would not rise to make a remark at this time, were it not that I wish to make a personal correction, more than anything else, regarding a sentiment that fell from the lips of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster). He said he was tired of the assumptions of some gentlemen upon this floor. I suppose the gentleman has forgotten that he assumed to read me a lesson on Saturday—that he assumed to dictate to me the course that I should pursue on this floor. And now, once for all, I allude to the circumstance. I am but a young man, and none but he who is heartless—who is lost to all the feelings of humanity—would rise in his place and attempt to smother a young man who is endeavoring to discharge his duty. I came to Indiana, sir, a poor and friendless boy. I have won for myself a place in the affections of the people; they have elected me to this Convention; and for the first time, I have learned from a man who is here, I suppose, to represent the talent and learning of the State, that I have not an equal voice with him upon this floor, because, forsooth, I have not so long a beard? Sir, if beard is an evidence or test of the qualification that the people require in their representative, I think the people of Monroe county would be equally well represented if they had sent a goat here. [Laughter.] I always endeavor to treat gentlemen with due courtesy. I listen at all times to those who are older than myself with reverence and respect; but I care not how old a man may be who introduces a measure here; I care not if the frosts of a hundred winters have passed over his head; if he does that which I think he should not do, I have a right to raise my voice against it. I did, perhaps, allude somewhat harshly to the gentleman from Wayne, the other day, and I think I had reason to do so. That gentleman on one occasion rose up, in the course of a debate, and directed against me a personal insult. I undertake to say, sir, that I have never occupied more than fifteen minutes of the time of this Convention upon any one occasion, with, perhaps, one exception; and in this I differ from the gentleman from Monroe. I was sent here, sir, to express the views of the people whom I represent; and none, save a few heartless demagogues, who find their way here by some means or other, would take exception to the expression of the views of the people of my county by their representative. This, then, will be my course; if the Convention determine to act without debate, I will hold my peace; but if there is to be an expression of the sentiments of the people, I feel it my duty to express the sentiments of those whom I represent, independently of the dictation of any gentleman.

Mr. DOBSON rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. DOBSON (yielding the floor). Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to see that the gentleman is a little under the influence of irritation. I certainly had no disposition to irritate him much the other day in the casual remark that I made. But the gentleman will recollect, or if he will refer to statistics on the subject, he will find that he has occupied as much time, perhaps, as any other gentleman.

Mr. BASCOM. I challenge the gentleman to produce the statistics that show any such thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not controvert the right of the gentleman to speak; he has an equal right with myself or any other delegate. But I thought that the course which he pursued was not altogether as courteous as it might be. And when he made a personal attack upon the gentleman from Wayne, who is old enough to be his father—I say it was a personal attack, for he read a dirty, scurrilous article from a newspaper, which had no relevancy to the question under consideration, and none to the subject that was before the Convention—I told him he ought to tarry at Jericho until his beard was grown. By that, I meant that it did not become one so young to attack an aged man—that he ought to have some respect for age—that is all. I did not wish to dictate to the gentleman; very far from it.

Sir, I have not risen for the purpose of castigating the gentleman in the slightest degree, but merely to express the views by which I was actuated when I made the remark, which seems to have given him so much offense, the other day. I will not say that the gentleman has been troublesome; but one thing is certain: if the gentleman has not occupied the floor long at a time, he has occupied it as often as any other delegate. In this I challenge contradiction. But I have no intention to reply to the gentleman's remarks. It would give him too much consequence; therefore, I have not another word to say.

Mr. DOBSON. I have been patiently listening to this discussion for some time past, and I must say that I regret very much the course the debate has taken. I was not here at the introduction of the resolutions, and as to the propriety or impropriety of this introduction, I have not a word to say at present. It is not always what men do, so much as it is the manner in which they do it, that produces good or ill effects. And the manner in which we are disposing of this subject it seems to me is calculated to do more harm than the final result can do good. We have been voting on all manner of propositions embracing all manner of subjects. We have been traveling from Maine to Texas. I will not say whether the Convention is right or wrong in so doing; but it does seem to me, if I look at this thing right, that we all could vote conscientiously and fairly for the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, with a very slight variation. What is it that we are asked to do? We are merely asked to say whether we, as delegates of this Convention, and as citizens of the confederacy of States, and citizens of Indiana, are willing to sustain the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of the country, as we have sworn here, and as we are bound by our allegiance generally to do. Now, sir, from the first inception of the Constitution of the United States to the present time, those who have obeyed the laws, and those who have not, have generally paid the penalty which their resistance deserved—I do not make the remark for the purpose of forcing over a vote here—but I say that those who have disobeyed the laws have always received their reward, sooner or later. The first serious opposition to the law, as far as I know, was what is called Shay's rebellion. Is any man prepared to say that those who were engaged in that movement, did right? Is any man prepared to say that in any stage of the proceedings that the law was not an iniquitous law, or that it was wrong in principle, or that those who undertook to resist it was doing right? Washington did not think they were in the right; nor did any right minded man think they were doing right. The next instance was the nullification proceedings in South Carolina. They were put down, and no man here will pretend to say those who resisted the law on that occasion did right. I apprehend that every gentleman will agree with me, that the General Government was perfectly justifiable in using force to put down those who resisted the law. The supremacy of the law should be maintained, and we are merely required here to say whether we will sustain the laws of the United States or not. I had hoped—I had long since hoped, that the time would never come when any man would deliberately undertake to calculate the value of the Union; when a man would sit down and consider whether he should obey the law or not. But we seem to have reached that time.

Let us return to these resolutions. The gentleman from Allen says that he will go for sustaining the laws of the country, although he finds fault with the law. He says that we should sustain them whether we like them or not, until we can repeal them in a Constitutional manner. Then why not say so—by his vote he says he will not sustain them. These resolutions, sir, do not propose that we shall endorse all these laws, in every particular, but their main features only. It is not important for us to stop to inquire, whether we are pleased with all the details of these laws. What we have to inquire is, merely, whether we approve of them in the main and whether we disapprove of the proceedings of the agitators of the North and at the South, and of their resistance to the law. Now what will be the consequence of the adoption of these resolutions? Gentlemen may say that it is of little importance that we should make these declarations. I admit, sir, that one step is but a small matter. This house was built by placing one brick upon another. An individual has no intention of going to the devil, when he makes the first step, but he takes one step after another, in that direction, until finally he smells brimstone in right down earnest. There are one hundred and fifty of us, besides the officers of this Convention; does any one of us believe that he will be disturbed in the quiet possession of his house in his absence, knowing that the laws of the country surround him and protect him in his rights, and that no one dares to disturb his family in his absence. No man can disturb him with impunity. Where is the impropriety then of declaring that we are for maintaining the supremacy of the law. I was sorry to hear one gentleman, Mr. Mather, say, that our opinion is not worth much. I think that he would take that back if he had the remark to make over again. I believe that our opinions are worth a good deal; that they will have influence not only in this State, but throughout the Union; and I believe that occupying the position we do, we should be careful that we do not set a bad example. When large timber falls it is a bad time for the saplings in the neighborhood. It is an easy thing to acquire the habit of placing one's self in opposition to the laws, and of resisting them. And when that course is once commenced where is it to end? I care not what the law is. If it be a law passed in a Constitutional manner, we are all bound by it. We are bound to yield obedience to all the laws of Government. The Government has cost us a good deal, but it has been a good bargain, for I believe it is a better Government than any other on the face of the earth. We want it perpetuated, and the way to have it, is to live up to it, in letter and in spirit. When you go to fell a large oak, you do not expect to do it with a single blow; but even a boy, by persevering efforts, can bring it to the ground. So if we accustom ourselves by small gradations to resist the law, after a while we shall have nothing but discord and confusion, and the strong will trample upon the rights of the weak.

Now I should be disposed even to vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from St. Joseph, because I repudiate this doctrine of resistance to the law, as well at the South as at the North. But I think we have in the other resolutions, as much as it is necessary for us to say; and I hope the House will now come to a vote and adopt the resolutions, and that we shall then proceed to the business that properly belongs to us.

Mr. RITCHEY. I am sorry, sir, that this matter has been introduced into the Convention. I look upon it, sir, as altogether foreign to the business that belongs to us. I regretted the effort that was made by the gentleman from Wayne to introduce these resolutions something like a week ago, and I voted against suspending the order of business to allow him to introduce them, and I did it for the same reason that I have since voted to oppose them in every shape. I believe, sir, that they were altogether out of place and unnecessary. I came here, sir, and swore at your desk to discharge a duty as Delegate from the county of Johnson, to attempt to amend or remodel our Constitution, and to do nothing else. And so far as I was concerned, I expected to have nothing to do with extrinsic matters. Well, sir, I care not whether the proposition be right, in itself, or not. I was not sent here to vote for everything that was right, whether it be a law that has passed Congress or anything else. The question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, or that of the gentleman from Posey, is right, is a question that I am not bound to answer, and I shall not hesitate to vote against measures that may be clearly right in themselves if they do not come within the duties that I am sent here to perform. But some gentlemen say that as the resolutions are before us we are bound to vote for them. I have heard, sir, since I came back to the Convention yesterday—for I have been at home for a little time, and perhaps it would be better for some other gentlemen to go home, perhaps it would improve their knowledge of the wishes of the people—sentiments that I have regretted to hear. I am inclined to believe, from conversations which I have had with the people of my county, that if the members of the Convention were to go home for a few weeks or until after the adjournment of the Legislature, they would come back much better qualified to express the sentiments of the people than they are now or are likely to be, and especially if such fire-brands are to be thrown in here to incapacitate us for the discharge of our duties. I have heard a number of gentlemen in this Hall say that it was wrong to introduce these resolutions into the Convention, but that since they are here they are bound to vote for them. Sir, that is a course of action that I do not understand. It is a system of practice that I have not been accustomed to be governed by. If it was wrong to introduce them I hold that it is right to get them out of the way as soon as practicable, and by every means direct and indirect. If I believe a measure to be wrong and that it ought not to be introduced, I am not to be driven to vote for it, even though I believe it to be right. But what is the argument that is urged here for this Convention to step out of its way and take up this extrinsic matter and to spend two or three days in the discussion of a subject that is altogether foreign to the business which we were sent here to transact? Why it is said that the Union is in danger. Well now does any man believe that the Union is in danger?

A VOICE. "Yes. I do."

Mr. RITCHEY. Well, then, gentlemen do believe it. But if they do, they must believe it upon very slight evidence, indeed. I am one of those who have not felt during the agitations of last summer that the Union was in danger. I know there has been a great deal of talk on the subject of the danger of disunion for several years, but I have never seen anything that has lead me to believe that the Union has been in danger for the ten years past. We have seen petitions presented to the Legislature in language quite as strong as that of the petition which set the gentleman from Wayne on fire—which fired his breast with so much patriotism. I recollect that nearly ten years ago a petition came from Wayne county, asking that the negroes should be allowed the right of suffrage, trial by jury, and all the rights that appertain to the white citizen of Indiana. And to the best of my recollection they have continued to petition annually. And there has been no excitement in Indiana more dangerous than that for the last ten years. And I cannot, for my life, see why it is that gentlemen should go into spasms lest the Union should speedily be dissolved. But admitting that the Union is in danger, I ask you if any man is weak enough to suppose that the passage of these resolutions will save it? I am as much attached to the Union as any man on this floor, and if I believed that the Union was in danger I should look forward with as painful forebodings as any gentleman; but I cannot believe it is in danger, nor do I believe that if it be, the passage of these resolutions will contribute one iota to its perpetuation. Why, sir, even if it were a proper remedy at the outset we have spoiled it, and it is too late now to talk about it. If it could have had any efficacy in prolonging the existence of the Union, the remedy has been spoiled by mixing up too many drafts in it. I am in favor of the motion now before the Convention for the indefinite postponement of these resolutions. If it had gone abroad and the people were of the opinion that the Union was in danger, and they had confidence in the measures proposed by the proper tribunal, it might then have some effect; but at present I think it had better be laid aside than to pass it with a meagre vote. Sir, at the commencement of this Convention, according to my belief, the State Printer of Indiana had a right to demand the printing of this Convention.

A VOICE. "What has that to do with the matter before us."

Mr. RITCHEY. I will tell you what it has to do with it. When I so stated I did it with the conviction that I was right. But when the Convention decided that he was not entitled to the printing, I refused to vote for the appointment of any other printer, although the Convention decided that he was not the printer to the Convention. I was not convinced by their decision. I had my own opinion still, and when the election was had I refused to vote. I say that I believe that this matter is altogether foreign to our business here, and that I shall have nothing to do with it. I shall do upon this occasion as I did upon the occasion of electing a printer to this Convention. I believe that it is improper that we should have anything to do with it, and by no vote of mine shall it be endorsed. I have voted heretofore to get clear of it, and I shall now vote for its indefinite postponement. I hold that the Convention has no right to know whether I approve of the compromise measures of Congress or not. I will not say whether the proposition of the gentleman from Posey is right or whether it is wrong. I object to making any expression in regard to it, and I hope to see in this case, as in any other, a protest entered upon the journals discountenancing the introduction of such resolutions. I had not expected to see incendiary declarations such as these now before us, and I hope now that the Convention will proceed to take the vote upon the indefinite postponement, and that we shall then proceed to attend to our proper business; for even if the Union were in danger it would do more harm to adopt these resolutions than to get clear of them by indefinite postponement. You have effectually spoiled the remedy which otherwise might have had some efficacy.

Mr. BROOKBANK. Since so much time has been occupied in the discussion of this subject, I do hope, as a matter of courtesy, if nothing else, that I may be permitted to say a few words in reference to it. ["Consent."]

It is with sincere and heartfelt regret, sir, that I rise to occupy one moment of the time of this House, in relation to a subject which I regard as foreign from our proper duties. But in view of the shape that this business has assumed, and with my determination to keep my seat in this Hall during all controversies and all votes, it must necessarily follow that an opinion or expression must come from every member who keeps his seat here while the vote is taken, unless he refuse to vote at all, which I do not choose to do upon this or any other occasion. With this determination on my part, I feel, sir, that it is due to myself, and to the constituents whom, in part, I have the honor to represent, to define my position and the reasons for the vote I shall give.

I need not say that I, too, regret this subject having been introduced into this body; nay, sir, I have not language to express my surprise that either the father or stepfather of this project should have seen fit to have introduced it upon this body.

But with all deference to their better judgment and experience, and with the high personal regard which I entertain for them, I cannot dispel my doubts of the propriety of such a step.

But, Mr. President, it is too late for regrets; it is before us, and must be met.

It is with equal surprise, sir, that I have listened to the various subterfuges resorted to by its advocates to compel members to sustain it.

A continual cry is heard about disunion, and many attempts are made to force upon men a conviction that it is their bounden duty in view of their obligations to this "sacred Union," to assert their patriotism and fidelity to the Union, in this Hall of Delegates convened to alter, revise, or amend the Constitution of Indiana!

And how, sir, is this proposed to be done? Why, by endorsing the compromise measures of the late Congress. Against such means I most solemnly and seriously protest. And my vote shall accord with this sentiment.

But I cannot and will not sit passively here, after more than two days and over twelve hundred dollars have been spent, or uselessly thrown away, in discussing matters foreign and irrelevant to our business, without giving an expression in addition to my vote, wherein my position and opinion may be seen.

Whenever the good people of Union county see fit to appoint or elect me to constitute one of a committee of criticism upon the acts of Congress, I shall then feel under obligation to discharge that duty to the best of my ability, but not while a member of this Convention.

Next, the oath that we have here taken has been alluded to by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) as making it compulsory upon us to express an opinion in regard to the merits or constitutionality of the measures of Congress. To this I also object.

Mr. DOBSON. I said that we were sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and in consequence of the allegiance which we owe to the General Government, as well as in consequence of that oath, we are bound to sustain the laws of the land.

Mr. BROOKBANK. I think, Mr. President, that the oath which has been administered here has been understood by us all; and I think that gentlemen will agree that I have at least had an opportunity of understanding it, since it has been twice administered to me in this Convention. ["Consent."]

That part of our oath which refers to the Constitution of the United States, simply requires that what we may enact here, shall not conflict with any of its provisions.

The next and most essential part of our obligation is that we shall well and faithfully discharge our duties here as members of this Convention, in altering and amending the Constitution of Indiana.

For that purpose alone came we here, and I here declare that I will give no vote upon this floor, that can possibly be construed to endorse or sustain any subject foreign to that, if I know it.

And I forewarn gentlemen that if they introduce a proposition, although it be a precise transcript of my own sentiments, if it have no relevancy to our legitimate province, I shall vote against it.

And I forewarn gentlemen of another thing, that they need not construe that vote to be an expression of my sentiments upon the subject in itself—I shall vote against such propositions on all occasions, upon the principle that they have no connection with our special duties—regardless of their cries of disunion, treason, or abolitionism.

As I said before, I sincerely regret that these resolutions were introduced here, for they have only served to produce ill feeling, by eliciting a discussion that has aroused a partisan spirit, which should by all means have been avoided in this Convention.

I came here almost entirely inexperienced in matters of legislation, but I had hoped, that, at least, good feeling would prevail amongst the delegates of the Convention, during the progress of our labors—but I have been sorely disappointed.

The time has already elapsed, in which the people of Indiana expected that the labors which we were sent here to perform, would have been completed.

We are to-day, not one-third done the amount which is placed before us; and yet gentlemen here are willing to spend day after day, in discussing any and every extraneous matter which may be presented; especially if there is a probability of its affording a little political capital.

It is not my purpose to bring any charge against members of delaying business intentionally, or of a wilful neglect of duty; on the contrary, I think, that as a general thing, they have been industrious and prompt to duty.

But I do think that if gentlemen would deliberately reflect for a moment upon the state of our progress; and, as has been intimated by the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) if they had an opportunity of hearing the remarks that are made abroad concerning this Convention, they would be admonished to desist from these speculative discussions, and proceed to the consideration of those topics which appertain to the special object for which they are convened.

Why, sir, it has been said by some persons out of this Hall, that this Convention, at times, presents more the appearance of a mob, than that of a deliberative body.

I should not be surprised, if these resolutions or any others of a similar character, pass this body, indignation meetings should be held, and a voice of reproof come up from the yeomanry and the press of all parties, saying: "Come down from a place which you are no longer worthy to fill."

But, Mr. President, in all candor, this and other improvident and inappropriate squanderings of the people's money, will have a great tendency to prejudice the public mind against the Convention and anything it may do; thereby endangering the adoption of our Constitution when submitted for ratification.

It would be my delight, sir, to contemplate the perfection of such a one as would meet with universal approbation, and one that might be held up to the gaze of an admiring world, and to our sister States, as a "model Constitution."

But if this gratifying result is ever to be realized, we must cease our bickering and strife about things which do not directly concern us, and proceed as quickly as possible with those that more immediately pertain to our duty.

With regard to the question of attachment to the Union, I have but this to say: My constituents are a law-abiding, order-loving people, and I entertain no fears of an organized resistance to the laws of the land in that quarter, while they remain on the statute book of the Union.

And to give any vote here that would be intended, or could possibly be construed, to have reference to their measure of attachment to the Union, would be an insult to their good sense and patriotism. And not only so, it would be a work of supererogation, since their fidelity and patriotism have never been questioned.

In respect to myself, I am willing that others may judge.

As a general rule, when individuals are eager to assert their innocence, before a charge has been preferred, the presumption is, that there is some ground for suspicion: in other words, "a guilty conscience needs no accuser."

Hence these high-sounding protestations of "love of country," and "attachment to the Union," can have no other effect, in my opinion, than to give an intimation that we at least, suspect ourselves, or some of our fellow-citizens.

Now, God forbid, that I should participate in any such imputations, by vote or otherwise. It ought to bring contempt and disgrace upon any man that would speak or vote such a sentiment. It should condemn, and politically ruin him forever. ["Consent."]

I have said, Mr. President, that I did not wish to occupy the time of the Convention. I have not done so heretofore, and will not further now. But I felt it due to myself and to those whom I represent, to make the statements that I have made.

Mr. DOBSON. I wish to say a single word in explanation of a remark of mine, which the gentleman seems to have misapprehended. I stated that we had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States; that we were bound, by the oath we have taken, as well as by the allegiance that we owe to the Government of the United States, to support the laws of the United States. I maintain that every individual is bound to support the laws of the country, whether he approves of them or not, even to the surrendering up of the last particle of property that he possesses; aye, even to the surrendering up of his life. The Government has a right to demand this of every citizen—and why? Because the Government protects him in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property—in the enjoyment of all the rights of the citizen—this obligation is binding upon every citizen. He is bound to discharge any duty that is imposed upon him by the Government, to aid in the suppression of riot, tumult, and disorder, or any other service. If the muttering thunders of war are heard in the distance, the Government has a right to say to him, We want your property or your services, and, whether willing or not, he is bound to obey.

The Constitution that we have sworn to support, I take it, is as strong and as binding upon us as the fugitive slave law; viz.: no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor is due. The fugitive slave law, as it is called, only carries out the provisions of this clause of the Constitution of the United States, which I have just read—at least that is its object. It may be wrong in some of its details, but we are not endorsing the details—but its main features, and declaring that we will sustain the law, while it remains upon our statute book.

Mr. OWEN. As one of the sets of resolutions now proposed to be postponed, was introduced by myself, and as, in the course of the debate, various inquiries have been directed to me, it may be proper that I occupy a few moments in reply. One thing is quite certain, that these resolutions of mine cannot be liable alike to the objections made to them by the gentleman from Ripley, and to those made by the gentleman from Allen. These gentlemen cannot both be correct. Yesterday the gentleman from Ripley told us that it was not worth while to vote for these resolutions, since they contained little or nothing; while the gentleman from Allen told us, this morning, that they contain altogether too much. I imagine that the truth may be found to lie between them. What do they contain? Three very plain, distinct points, expressed in simple language. The first is: That in the opinion of this Convention, the common sentiment of the people of Indiana, sustains and endorses, in their general features and intention, the compromise measures, as passed by Congress.

That is the first point. The second is: That we recognize, in the success of these measures, an earnest of security and perpetuity to our glorious Union.

And the third is: That, whatever may be the opinions of individuals, as to the wisdom or policy of the details contained in the acts of Congress above referred to, it is the duty of all good citizens to conform to their requisitions.

These are the three points embraced in the resolutions submitted by me as an amendment. Gentlemen may disagree respecting them, but certainly they are definite, and they are easily comprehended.

The gentleman from Allen argues that we ought not to endorse the general features of the compromise measures, because they work injustice to the North. He objects to the measure respecting the boundaries of Texas, and puts to me the question whether Texas ever did legally own the territory lying between the Puerco and the upper Rio Grande. In my judgment she never did. And my opinion on this point is of record; given at the time when the question of boundary was, not between Texas and the United States, but between Texas and Mexico. If I may be excused for doing, in this instance, what is very rarely my habit, I will furnish the gentleman proof of this, from a speech of mine, delivered in Congress, in January, 1847:

"Texas, never recognized as an independent nation by Mexico, had, and could have, no western boundary fixed by treaty. She claimed to the Rio Bravo. On the lower portion of that stream her original claim, by conquest and possession, to the line of the river, could hardly be considered as invalidated by a half deserted village or two, and a few scattering huts tenanted by Mexicans, on its eastern bank. The case above the mouth of the Puerco was different. Several small Mexican towns, besides Santa Fe, with her ten thousand inhabitants, were scattered over the valley east of the upper river. Upon the whole, then, the exact line of boundary might, not unfairly, be considered a debatable question, and proper subject for negotiation."

Here was the opinion expressed, that the western boundary of Texas was a "proper subject of negotiation," as between Texas and Mexico. Far more, then, ought it to be regarded as a fit subject for compromise now, as between Texas and the federal Government.

And now, if the gentleman from Allen asks me whether the line as fixed in the boundary bill, runs exactly where it should—no fraction of a degree too far North or too far South—and whether ten millions is the exact sum which, in fairness, ought to have been granted to Texas, in order to effect the compromise of this boundary question, my reply is, that that is a matter we are not called upon to decide. I but say, generally, that it were infinitely better that five or ten millions of money should be cast into the depths of the ocean, than that there should be risk of disunion, or of civil war between the General Government and one of the States.

The gentleman has alluded to the Missouri Compromise line, and intimated that its extension to the Pacific is indirectly sanctioned in one of the Territorial bills. There is nothing of the kind. In no one of the bills is the extension of that line incorporated, directly or indirectly, by express provision, or by inference. I may add that, as regards the deputation in Congress from this State, generally, they never endorsed the extension of that line. Exceptions I admit there were; but, for myself, I always voted against it. There is nothing of that character here to be endorsed. Nor is there, in the bills in question, the slightest word which may be construed into a recognition of slavery, directly or indirectly, into any portion of our new Territory.

Again, sir, it is an acknowledged principle of international law, and I may remark, by the way, that that principle was publicly asserted by me upwards of three years ago, at a time when it was not received and recognized as at this day it is; but it is now an admitted rule of international law, that territory conquered or acquired by treaty shall remain subject to the existing laws, until these laws are changed by the Government thus acquiring possession. It is also admitted, that in none of these Territories did slavery exist when we acquired them. It follows that it can be introduced then, only by positive enactment. Such enactment never can be had. No law introducing slavery into any of these territories ever can be passed. As soon might this solid dome above our heads crumble to atoms, and crush us in the ruins of its fall.

Then in endorsing these measures generally, we do not endorse, directly or indirectly, by implication or otherwise, the principle of slavery extension.

In conclusion I express the hope that, since the Convention has decided by a deliberate vote, that these resolutions shall not remain on the table, nor yet be referred to a committee—a motion for which I voted, in hope of saving time—that they may be acted upon now, boldly and at once. I think we may very properly declare, for I believe it to be the truth, absolutely the truth, emphatically the truth, that the common sentiment of the people of Indiana, of a large and overwhelming majority of them, approves and endorses in their general purport and intent, the compromise measures of last session.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said: I have listened for three days to the extended discussions upon these resolutions, without even a desire to prolong the debate by any remarks of mine. Too much has already been said. I regretted the introduction of the resolutions, for the reason that they were calculated to provoke discussion, by opening a fruitful field for the propagation of the discordant sentiments of the various members. The subjects were of an exciting character, and it might have well been inferred that they would still continue to excite wherever they were to be debated. I shall not attempt to discuss the merits of the several measures of which they speak, or to investigate the arguments on either side, but shall content myself with five minutes' time, to make plain the votes which I have given, and which I shall give, upon the case in hand.

In the first place, I voted to lay the subject upon the table, to save time and to save the expense incident to the making and printing long speeches on a matter which I considered beyond the rightful jurisdiction of this body. I afterwards voted against a re-consideration of that vote, because I apprehended a renewed and continued debate, which had already extended itself into all the great questions which had been acted upon by the last Congress—matters purely political, and calculated to distract the public mind, and to embarrass the business legitimately pertaining to this Convention.

The arguments already adduced are voluminous. They are, in many respects, calculated to divide the people, and to furnish fuel for an inflammatory state of the public mind—the details of the compromise measures, the policy of the Government in the admission of States and territories, and the effect of these measures upon the Northern and Southern sections of the Union. The opponents of those measures have reiterated much of the sentiment of those who are known as abolitionists; every idea which they have hitherto urged, has been newly dressed and again presented to the people of Indiana, sanctioned by the influence of their authors, as members of the Constitutional Convention. Under such circumstances, I no longer feel willing to permit the impression to go abroad, that our feelings and sentiments in any way or manner harmonized with those who condemned the compromise of these great national questions. We should now send the antidote along with the poison. No man should be permitted to infer that Indiana is even in a doubtful attitude in reference to the great principles of these resolutions. Although I have condemned the propriety of introducing the subjects, and voted against the expediency of entertaining them, yet as they have been forced upon us, let us dispose of them in such a way as to convince the people of our sister States that we are supporters of the Constitution of the Union, of the Union in all its parts, that we defend the sovereignty of the laws, and are ready to uphold their proper administration.

No act of this Convention should show that these abolition speeches, made in this Hall, or elsewhere, have weakened our faith in the union and stability of our Government, or in the full support of those who are required to execute its laws. Let our vote be so full, so unanimous, that it will silence the surmise that we are in any wise tinctured with a want of patriotic devotion to our common country.

I care not who may be the author of a true sentiment. I recognize, in the main, a true principle in the resolutions of the gentleman from Wayne, and also in those of the gentleman from Posey. They both utter a true, an elevated, and a patriotic feeling, such as will be responded to by a very large majority of the people. Therefore let us no longer discuss them, but give a decisive vote in their favor, pass them, clear the way, and go on with our labors. I do hope that the vote may be large, that it may be conclusive, and that we will take the vote and make our decision without further loss of time. Indiana is for the Union, and who dare say to the contrary?

Mr. READ of Clark. I have not, as yet, taken part in the debate upon this question and I must, therefore, be permitted to occupy the time of the Convention for a few moments. I am opposed, sir, to the indefinite postponement of the subject that is before us. I think it is our duty to dispose of it in the way in which such a question should be disposed of by a direct vote. If gentlemen are not prepared to vote for the resolutions proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, nor for those of the gentleman from Posey, let us refer them to a select committee, that they may be modified by the committee, if need be, and reported back to us in the shape in which they ought to be adopted by the Convention. The Government of the United States itself, is based upon the principles of concession and compromise, and the very subjects about which we are speaking, have been subjects of compromise. For instance there is the fugitive slave law. Take that solitary and alone, and I am opposed to it; but upon the principle of compromise I have adopted it, and I believe it to be our duty to carry it out in good faith. I do not believe there is so much danger of the dissolution of the General Government, as is anticipated by some gentlemen. To be sure Congress, last winter, slept upon them so long and dreamed upon it, until they took fire, and, as a matter of course, came to the conclusion, that the whole Government was on fire also.

Sir, I do not believe there is that danger that is anticipated by many. It is said we have nothing to do with this matter. Let gentlemen calmly reflect upon it. Did not the Grand Jury of the United States District Court, now setting in the same building we occupy, the other day, exercise the power of making a report upon the subject? And you know that the Legislatures of the several States, do assume a power to give an expression of opinion in regard to public matters which affect the Union. This is the first Convention that has met since the compromise measures have been passed by Congress. But you will find that all bodies of this description, that will meet, will give an expression of their opinion. Now, sir, we must reflect that however gentlemen may condemn the South, all of the South is not against us. There are parties there, sir, as well as here—there are parties there who are deprecating the conduct of the fanatics of the North and South as much as we are. Why, do we not see that lately, the State of Georgia, and other States, have succeeded in establishing a Union party. One thing that brings conviction to my mind very forcibly, is that I read a letter the other day from a distinguished gentleman of Tennessee, in which the writer says, Can you not give an expression of the Convention upon the subject of the compromise and the Union, that will come to us with all the healing properties of balm of Gilead, like oil poured upon the troubled waters; for we have a great deal to contend against. The agitators are seizing upon everything that can possibly tend to excite the minds of the people. Is not this a subject worthy of our attention? I do not believe there is a man here in Indiana, that is opposed to the Union. I believe that our citizens generally love their country and their Government, as well as I do. Talk of disunion to us! Impossible. I will not believe that there is an American patriot who desires to outlive the Union of the States—our eagle cannot be divided, she will not pursue the star of a particular State, she ever will remain the American eagle. Ambitious and designing men may form their plans, the fury of faction may, for a while, threaten our Union, but there is a redeeming spirit in the intelligence and patriotism of the people. As long as the people have knowledge and virtue, everything is safe; our political bark will continue to move smoothly on, unfolding its splendor to an astonishing world, gathering new vigor from every breeze, and smiling at the folly of the waves that beat and burst harmless around it.

Sir, I have no fears that any faction can ever arise in this Union sufficiently strong to dissolve this Government. I again repeat, let us keep the people virtuous and intelligent, and the country is safe. I have no fears about disunion, and I trust that we shall compromise this matter by referring the resolutions to a committee, and that they will be put in such a form that they will receive, not only a majority of the votes, but an unanimous vote of this Convention.

Mr. JOHNSON. In order that we may get at the business that we have been sent here to do, I move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment? I wish to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN then withdrew his amendment.

The demand for the previous question was renewed.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson inquired of the Chair what would be the effect of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT replied, that it would bring the Convention to a vote upon the pending amendment, cutting off the motion for indefinite postponement.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 100, nays 26:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—100.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Brookbank, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Graham of Miami, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, May, Mower, Newman, Robinson, Steele, Wallace, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich—26.

So the previous question was demanded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The main question being first on the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen.)

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 99, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mower, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—99.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Cole, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Hogin, Howe, Kilgore, May, Moore, Newman, Niles, Rariden, Robinson, Walpole, Work, and Wunderlich—23.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolutions as amended, and upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and were taken with the following result, yeas 90, nays 26:

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

Those who voted in the negative were, Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Hogin, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Milligan, Morgan, Newman, Niles, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Watts, and Wunderlich—25.

So the resolutions as amended were adopted.

The names of the following gentlemen being called by the Secretary, they severally rose, and addressing the Chair, respectfully declined voting upon the resolutions:

Messrs. Anthony, Biddle, Colfax, Mather, and Ritchey.

Mr. COOKERLY. I give notice that I will to-morrow move a re-consideration of the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT. It is not necessary that notice should be given of a motion to re-consider.

Mr. COOKERLY. Well then, sir, I make the motion, and move that it be laid over until to-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the first section of the fifth report for the third reading.

The section is as follows:

SECTION 1. There shall be elected in each county by the qualified electors thereof, a Sheriff, Soroner, Recorder, County Auditor, County Treasurer, and a Clerk of the Circuit Court, at the time and places of holding elections for members of the General Assembly. The Clerk, Auditor, and Recorder, shall each continue in office four years and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified. But no person shall be eligible to the office of Clerk, Recorder, or Auditor, more than eight years in any term of twelve years. The Sheriff, Coroner, and Treasurer, shall each continue in office two years and until their successors shall be chosen and qualified: Provided, That no person shall be eligible to the office of Sheriff or Treasurer, more than four years in any term of six years.

The question being, Shall the section pass? the yeas and nays were taken, under the rule, and resulted—yeas 105, nays 14—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bright, Bryant, Carr, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Howe, Kilgore, Morgan, Newman, Pettit, Steele, Watts, and Wolfe—14.

So the section was passed and referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

Section 4 of Report No. 5 was then taken up upon its final passage, and read as follows:

“A competent number of Justices of the Peace shall be elected by the qualified electors in each township in the several counties, and shall continue in office four years if they shall so long behave well, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law.”

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted—yeas 115, nay 1—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—114.

NAY.—Mr. Kilgore—1.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the regular orders of the day, and the several sections of reports No.'s 6 and 7, were read a third time and passed, with the exception of the last section of No. 6, relating to the residence of county and township officers, and the last section of No. 7, relating to the size and boundaries of counties.

THE CLARKESVILLE TRUST.

Mr. READ of Clark offered an amendment to the last section of report No. 6, which he presumed would be unanimously assented to by the Convention. He would read it, and, if it were not agreed to by unanimous consent, he would have to move it as a substantive section. He supposed the omission—for he regarded it merely as an omission—had been accidental. By the old Constitution it was provided that all district, county, or town officers, should reside within their respective districts, counties, or towns—the trustees of the town of Clarkesville excepted, and that they should keep their respective offices at such places therein as may be directed by law. He would state to the Convention that there was a tract of land donated by the State of Virginia, for the purpose of erecting a town. The donor constituted the trustees, with power to fill vacancies, and the matter had so continued to this day. These trustees resided in different States; and from this land a considerable fund had been realized, which had been loaned out, besides which there were several important suits pending, in which the trustees were plaintiffs; and if this exception was not made in the new Constitution, this fund could not be collected, nor the suits pending be brought to a close. This exception was made in the old Constitution, and he hoped there would be no objection to making it in the new one. He presumed it had been overlooked by the committee reporting the section.

Mr. THORNTON. In looking at this matter, it will be perceived that the trustees of the town of Clarkesville are a body possessing peculiar powers, and wholly different from that of any other of like character within this State.

It will be recollected that a thousand acres were appropriated by the Legislature of Virginia, upon which the town of Clarkesville was laid out, and that certain trustees were appointed to execute the trust. It seems by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be found in 6 Peter's Reports, p. 369, that as vacancies in the trusteeship could only be filled by the surviving or remaining trustees, it assumed something of the character of an inheritance, and passes, not to the successors, but to the heirs and legal representatives of the original trustees. Now, I would call the attention of the Convention to the matter, and suggest that something ought to be done, on this subject. These trustees all live, and have ever lived, in the town of Jeffersonville. Not a single individual of them reside in the town of Clarkesville; and I believe never have resided therein—and these funds have been held, disposed of, and enjoyed, by trustees living in Jeffersonville for years, and not a cent has been appropriated for the benefit of the town of Clarkesville.

Now, it seems to me that this corporation is so far above all law, that something ought to be done in this matter by this Convention. They hold themselves not responsible to any authority, except to the State of Virginia. They hold the funds, and I am authorized to say that they use them personally.—That they have appropriated them to their own use, and not a solitary cent has ever been appropriated to the town of Clarkesville. They even refused, or failed, when requested by the citizens of Clarkesville, to appropriate a dollar for the digging of a well there. Now, if it is intended to perpetuate this abominable and most aristocratic system of corporation, I shall vote against it. I trust that my friend over the way (Mr. Read) will not do anything that will tend to perpetuate this thing. I do not know that we have the power to do anything to correct the evil, but God knows we ought to have; for, if there be one thing under heaven that I would disapprove of more than another, it is a corporation which is not responsible to any authority whatever. If the Convention will investigate this matter, they will find that these trustees have held this fund for a long series of years; and, I believe, upwards of a half a century; and that they have applied thousands of dollars to their own private emolument, and not a cent has been appropriated to the public good. I shall, therefore, protest against any proposition by which it may be sought to perpetuate this corporation under its present form, so as to keep the funds in the hands of these individuals.

Mr. READ. I cannot subscribe to all that the gentleman has said to the Convention in reference to this corporation, so far as regards the appropriation of the funds by the trustees to their own private purposes. This is not correct. The present board I know to be composed of high-minded, honorable men.

This fund, however, unquestionably has been used, and, so far as I am aware, the citizens of the town of Clarkesville have received no benefit whatever from its proceeds; at least, I know of none. If any provision can be made whereby they can receive the benefit, I am willing to go for it. But it will be recollected—and the gentleman from Floyd knows it very well—that there is a considerable fund—some three or four thousand dollars, perhaps; I do not know the amount; and I am told that if we dissolve this board of trustees, that money cannot be collected. And not only that, but I am told, also, that there are suits pending, which would be dismissed, and then there certainly would not accrue to the town of Clarkesville, any benefit from them I have this on the authority of Mr. Crawford. I shall be in favor of any provision by which the citizens of Clarkesville can be benefited, as was doubtless the original design of the trust; but I am not willing to do anything which would squander away the whole fund. If any gentleman will offer a proposition by which the citizens of Clarkesville can have the benefit of this fund, I am ready to give it my support.

Mr. THORNTON. I was referred to by my friend over the way, (Mr. Read,) as a friend of the citizens of Clarkesville, and so far as a desire to see this fund properly applied, I am so. It appears to me that the provision which he proposed to insert in the section, will not affect that object. It only leaves it where it is. I understand that, although these trustees may be said to be municipal officers, attached originally to a municipal corporation, it seems to me that this is to all intents and purposes, a private corporation. Whether the consequences my friend suggests as being likely to result from any action of ours tending to change the nature of that corporation, I do not know; but it must be obvious to every one, that some effort ought to be made whereby this fund may be applied to the purposes for which it was designed by the donor.

Mr. READ. With the view of having this matter more fully investigated, I will move to re-commit this section to a select committee of three, with instructions similar to those I have read.

Mr. WATTS. I would merely suggest to the gentlemen from Clark and from Floyd, that it would be better not to interrupt the passage of this section now. Another section might be framed, which would cover all the ground, and it could be fixed by the committee on arrangement and phraseology, to come in in its proper place. I can see no objection to passing the section as it is.

Mr. NAVE. I now begin to understand this proposition. I must say, Mr. President, that I am in favor of passing the section as it is. The difficulties which have been suggested by the gentleman from Clarke (Mr. Read) I apprehend are only imaginary, and have no real existence. If they wish the town of Clarkesville to be benefited by the money thus donated, the only way to reach it is by passing the present section, thereby removing those gentlemen who are the trustees of that fund, and who have been controlling it improperly in a different town.

I am willing to admit that I place great confidence in the legal opinions of the gentleman referred to by the gentleman from Clark—I mean the opinions of Mr. Crawford; yet, sir, there never was a wrong without a remedy, and if we pass this section as it is, and remove the trustees who live in a different town, then the citizens of Clarkesville have their remedy against these individuals, and can recover their money. They can prosecute a suit by making themselves parties to the actions now pending in the courts, so that there is no difficulty to be apprehended whatever in reference to the action of the Convention in regard to this section. The law is clear. It is known to the very Hornbooks of the profession that there never was a wrong without a remedy; and if these trustees have money which belongs to the citizens of Clarkesville at Jeffersonville, as a matter of course the citizens of Clarkesville have their action against those persons in whose hands this money is, to be found, and against those who have had the money in times past and converted it to their own use. There is no need, therefore, to incorporate such a provision in the Constitution.

The Convention, I hold, have no right to make that attainable in law in reference to the past which was not attainable by the laws then existing. We have no power to create a right to recover in a matter that has heretofore taken place. We can only declare in reference to the future and not in reference to the past, and therefore, in my opinion, such a section would be unavailing and amount to nothing.

Mr. READ. I only wish to save the fund. There appears to be a difference of opinion among lawyers on the subject. I have it from a high legal authority that if any alteration is made in the section of the old Constitution, so far as this matter is concerned, the suits now pending cannot be brought to a close, and that there will be great danger of the fund being wholly lost, so far as the original intention was concerned.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit the section with instructions, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the final passage of the section, and it was agreed to by a unanimous vote.

DIMENSIONS OF COUNTIES.

The next question considered by the Convention was the last section of Report No. 7, which makes provision in relation to the dimensions of counties.

The question was, Shall the section be read a third time?

Mr. HUFF. Mr. President, it is with extreme reluctance that I again attempt to trouble this Convention with any amendments or further remarks on this subject, but I feel that I am not doing my duty to myself or my constituents to let it thus pass without making some effort. I still feel persuaded that I can offer something that will not be objectionable to the Convention, and at the same time be a great accommodation to some counties. It is true that it must be an extreme case where a county could be formed under such a provision, but there are cases in which such a provision would answer the purpose; and the county that I have the honor in part to represent, and the adjoining county, are cases of this kind. The two counties front about one hundred miles on the Ohio river, and there are some five or six considerable sized streams emptying into the Ohio from the extreme upper part of one and lower part of the other, and their respective county seats, which makes it very inconvenient for the citizens of those portions of said counties to get to and from their county seats. In fact, it is sometimes almost impossible without going to the river and boarding a boat; or, if they cannot get a boat without waiting too long, they sometimes throw a couple of logs in and fasten them together and board them. This kind of a conveyance will do very well if they wish to go down stream, but it will not do so well for traveling up stream, and consequently they have to depend entirely on a boat; and if no boat comes in time, they cannot go at all.

It is true, if our counties were well provided with good roads and bridges, it would not be so bad as at present; but there are times that, even with good roads and bridges, it is impossible to get along near the river, in consequence of its overflowing its banks, and also the banks of the smaller streams, by backing the water up them. Some of those small streams run nearly across the county. The great expense in attending courts under such a condition of things, is more than those people are willing to bear, if they could help themselves. Just think of the hardship of a witness having to attend court under such circumstances. If he is required to be there on Monday he is obliged to start the day before. Well, sir, our circuit courts generally continue in session from five to six days, and if the witness is detained there during the whole time he is from home seven days—five in attendance on the court, and two in going and returning. Well, if a man's services at home are worth anything, it is placing a very low estimate to say his services and the use of his horse are worth one dollar per day, and his expenses while in attendance are about one dollar per day; therefore, if the court is five days in session his time and expenses are twelve dollars, while his wages will amount to two dollars and fifty cents, which, in two cases out of three, he never gets. But if he is so fortunate as to get it, it leaves him minus only nine dollars and fifty cents. Some members may say that it is a tolerable hard case on witnesses, even when they live close by. I admit that it is, but not so hard as with any one living at such a distance, because they can return home every night, and be at little expense, and at the same time attend some to their own business.

These people feel well satisfied that they cannot get a large county if it is to be left to a majority of the voters of the counties out of which it is to be taken; but they think that the time is coming, and not very far distant, when even this privilege, that they could get a county that they had rather put up with, than to be subjected to the inconvenience to which they now are.

Mr. President, I have drawn up this amendment in such a way as to try to obviate the objections that were urged by some gentlemen, and at the same time not entirely tie up the hands of those that are not so pleasantly situated.

Some of those objections were, that it would cause litigation, and the Legislature would be troubled with petitions at great expense to the State. Well, sir, the principle cause of litigation under the present Constitution has been in attempting to take from one county and attach to another; and this amendment will only apply when the voters of the counties out of which such new county is to be taken, mutually agree to make a new county; it also makes it necessary that the boundaries shall be described so that they vote understandingly, and does not apply to taking from one county and attaching to another.

Mr. President, just see the situation that you place counties in that have a small surplus, say one hundred square miles; that is, two adjoining counties contain five hundred square miles each, and it becomes necessary in course of time to accommodate a portion of their citizens by laying off a new county; well, let the natural division of those counties be as it may, and the citizens be ever so favorable to doing justice to the new county, they cannot do it, owing to the Constitutional restriction; they cannot get one foot over the two hundred square miles. Whereas, if it was left to the voters of the two counties themselves, they might do justice to the third county, and might accommodate all parties much better, on account of natural divisions, such as water courses, &c.

Mr. President, if there was any one subject fully discussed in my county, and the adjoining county, it was this subject; and I believe that it was almost universally admitted that the present Constitution is too stringent; for, say they, if every person, man, woman and child, in the county, were in favor of forming a new county, they could not do it. They think this is too stringent.

And permit me now to make the prediction, that if this clause is left as stringent as it now is, and there is an open clause left in the Constitution for the Legislature to amend on certain conditions, that there will be a great deal more time and money spent in discussing petitions that will pour in to have this clause modified, than there possibly could be to leave it a little more liberal.

If my amendment should be adopted, the counties will have to settle the whole matter before they send it up to the Legislature.

I would say in conclusion, Mr. President, to those that are in favor of tying down those people, in the language of the fable of the boys and the frogs, though this may be sport to you it is death to us. I therefore propose to re-commit with the following instructions. I will read the section and then the instructions which I propose to add. The section, as it now stands amended, is:

"The General Assembly shall reduce no county to a less extent than four hundred square miles; nor shall any county with a less area than four hundred square miles be reduced below its present size."

And I propose to re-commit it, and instruct the committee to add:

"Except in the following case, to-wit: where the voters of two or more counties are desirous of forming a new county, and after laying off the same by metes and bounds, and giving their approbation to it by a vote of a clear majority of the votes of each county separately, in favor of it, at some general election."

Mr. WATTS. I should like to see my friend from Spencer accommodated, if it could be done without too great expense to the people of the State. He speaks of the long turn in the river, and the great distance which the people sometimes have to travel to reach the county seat. That is true to some extent, when the traveling is done by water; yet the land travel does not exceed the land travel of other counties in the State. He lives in what is called the "Ox-bow"—a singular turn of that resemblance; and you may travel all day on the water, and at evening not be more than three miles distant from the point from which you started in the morning, and we could not regulate matters so as to make the county seat more convenient. I think that some means might be devised by which we could settle this constant litigation in regard to county boundaries, which we have had almost ever since the old Constitution was framed. That Constitution has been violated under a peculiar rule of construction, and new counties have been formed where there was not any new territory to form them out of. I do hope that the Convention will put this matter in such a shape as to prevent this constant litigation.

Mr. KELSO. When this matter was before the Convention the other day, I was not present. The proposition, if I understand it, is to re-commit the section with instructions so to amend it that the people may have the power of determining upon this matter for themselves.

Now I had liked to have remarked that I did not blame my friend from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) for the course he has pursued, but that would be saying more than is due to him. I think he is to blame. It is true, as he says, there has been much trouble and litigation in the State of Indiana in reference to county boundaries; and perhaps in no county in the State more than from Dearborn county; and it was once so located as to make it extremely difficult and inconvenient to get from different portions of the county to any one point for a county seat. They changed the county seat, and they lawed and squabbled about it; and finally it seemed as if nothing would cure the difficulty but a division of the county. I suppose when the gentleman talks about a violation of the Constitution, he has reference to that more than to anything else. It is quite possible that in affecting that division they may have squeezed the Constitution pretty hard [a laugh]; and let me remark here that if you send back again to them a Constitution with this provision in it, they will commence squeezing it again; and they will squeeze it every time the necessity of the case is as pressing as it was in that instance. Yes, sir, whenever there is a barrier to the will of the people they will keep pressing against it; and devising some means to break it down. Then why should we put this barrier there? The language of the present Constitution says that no county shall be reduced below an area of four hundred square miles in the formation of a new county. And now, in the revised Constitution, you want to make it still stronger, and say that no county shall be in any case less than four hundred square miles. Sir, there are more instances than one in the State where circumstances render it absolutely necessary to make a division in the territory of counties, or to change their boundaries for the sake of convenience. Sir, the territory of a county belongs to the people of such county; it is a matter which they themselves have a right to control; and if there be two or three counties all interested in the same change, and if an arrangement can be made among themselves for taking a piece of this county and putting it on to that, or a piece from the second and adding it to the third, I maintain that in a matter of that kind there is no authority so legitimate as that of the people of such counties themselves to settle it. Now, sir, I can point to the very door of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) and show that it is absolutely necessary for the convenience of the people that a portion of Dearborn county should be added to Ohio, even if you take off a piece of Ohio county and add it to Dearborn by way of a swap. It is for this reason: the line between them being a water boundary, is for two-thirds of the year not navigable; the section lines cross it; and after you have passed up the stream some three or four miles, by its meanderings, there is not a quarter section of land on that creek that is not divided by it to some extent. There is not a farm bordering upon Laughery creek, above Hartford, that is not divided by it; and for some twenty or thirty miles along the county boundaries, following the meanders of the creek, every farm is divided by the county line, and so divided by that creek as to make the quantity of land in either county entirely uncertain and indeterminate without a regular survey. A man who has a farm thus divided does not know how much land he pays taxes for in either county. Now the very nature of the case makes it necessary that a change of territory should at some day be made, and the sooner the better. If we put this imperative clause in the Constitution and send it back to the people, they will be compelled to vote against it in self-defense. Now the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) will not deny that such is the position of the people on that county line. He may indeed say that they had no business ever to have had Ohio county, and then the difficulty would not have existed.

There was great excitement on that subject; they surveyed Dearborn county perhaps more than once, and I think no two of these surveys agreed; and they finally appealed to the record of the original survey, whereby they claimed a small surplus.

They claimed to have seventeen square miles over the four hundred; and at any rate they organized Ohio county with seventeen square miles. In fact I am not certain whether it was not less than that; but I am certain it was not more. And that little county took upon itself the expense of erecting public buildings, and then, afterwards, they were given from Dearborn, by a sort of compromise, (for it was thought the constitutional provision did not interfere after the county was organized,) what was south of Laughery creek, which left the people in a worse condition than they were in before. Now the condition of things is such that there is an absolute necessity for a change. This provision it seems to me can be productive of no great good. It is just equivalent to coming to this conclusion, that the people are not to be trusted at all with the regulation of those matters in which they are most directly interested. The Convention has already refused to permit them to become creditors at their own special instance; and it seems to me that there is no one thing that the Convention is disposed to leave the people to decide. I do think that when the people of a county have a portion of their territory that they can dispose of, and their adjoining neighbors of another county have also a portion of their territory that they can spare, and the people of both counties are willing to make the exchange for their mutual accommodation, or if out of the two counties a third can be created without prejudice to the interests of either, it may be safely left to the people of these counties themselves to arrange with the aid of the Legislature. Why should we by a stringent provision in our organic law prevent them from doing so? Surely the people themselves are the best judges of what they want in this respect. Can there be any harm in this? Is it possible that the people are not to be trusted? Are they so foolish and profligate that they would derange all the organization of the State—that they would break up everything like order and arrangement, and make matters worse than they are? Certainly if we make that clause imperative we leave matters in a very bad position, and I for one am not afraid to trust the people, for it would be impossible that they could make them worse. If I have aught at stake it is the probability that two miles of my county might be taken off to Ohio. Sir, whenever the people of the two counties make that arrangement I am not prepared to say that they shall not do it. It would not surprise me if they did. For the preservation of the county, as it now exists, it is necessary to make some change. Ohio needs it; it almost belongs to her. It is bounded by the congressional township line, leaving two miles of the township in Switzerland, and four miles of it in Ohio county. There is every year a division of the school funds, and there will be eternal difficulties about which shall have a certain portion of it, or about the fairness of that division.

Now all these things can be obviated; and it does seem to me that we ought to have confidence enough in the people to leave them some discretion on these matters, and not take upon ourselves to decide local matters which the people in the several localities are perfectly able to decide for themselves, and that in a manner much more satisfactorily to all the parties concerned than we can do.

MR. WATTS. I would like to say one or two words in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland. He refers to Laughery creek, and the small quantity of water which he says is in it for two-thirds of the year, and from that infers that there is no difficulty in crossing it. At the time that they were trying to organize this new county Laughery creek afforded a great deal of water almost all the time, so that it was almost impossible that the people living on the one side could get across to attend court on the other side. Since the new county was organized, however, Laughery creek affords but little water, and there is no difficulty now in crossing it. This county was organized out of about seventeen square miles, at a time when the county of Dearborn had not four hundred square miles in all her territory. After it was organized it was said that it was no violation of the Constitution to take a part of the territory from one county which was already formed to add it to another county. They did in two acts what any man would have incurred the guilt of perjury for doing in one. That was the way in which Ohio county was formed; and it is to prevent this evasion of constitutional provisions that I want to have the thing fixed by a provision in our organic law that shall be positive and certain. I do not want to see the boundaries of counties changed for the benefit of particular towns. I do not want to see the Constitution evaded and the people misled for any such purpose. I want to have it so fixed that hereafter the people will know where their county boundaries are, and that those boundaries shall be unalterable. That is my object.

Mr. GOOTEE. It seems to me that all the arguments that gentlemen have advanced on this floor are far from being satisfactory, and do not appear to touch the question at issue. My friend from Dearborn, last up, (Mr. Watts,) argues, as an objection to this amendment, that we have already had trouble enough on this subject, and that the expense to the State has been great in litigating these matters. Now all this may be true; but I would like to know from the gentleman if it follows as a matter of legitimate inference, that, because there has been a good deal of trouble between one or two counties, and because others have got organized just as they wish to be, there shall, therefore, never be organized another county? Why, sir, the argument is absurd. You might as well say, that, because a man has had a great deal of trouble in building him a house, or in clearing him a farm, nobody else shall ever build another house or clear another farm in the State of Indiana. [Laughter, and cries of "Hear! hear him!"] The argument is just as good in the one case as in the other. If the gentleman from Dearborn has got his county just as he wants it, why should he object to the people in another part of the State organizing a new county, if it suits their convenience to do so? Surely, Mr. President, this is a most arbitrary usurpation of power. The whole State, forthwith, must forever be prohibited from making new counties below certain dimensions, because the county of Dearborn has got her organization and her territory just as she wants it. Yes, sir, Dearborn takes the lead, and every other county must follow in her wake! Why, sir, it is just like this: A man is building him a house in the woods, and he gets his logs together, and gets them all up, and he immediately decides against "log rolling." [Laughter.] Now, sir, it ought to be borne in mind that the counties belong to the people who inhabit them. And I would like to know by what authority any man, or body of men, shall say the people of a county, or counties, shall not have power to change their boundaries, if they think proper to do so. Sir, to attempt to prevent this, appears to me to be a most unreasonable thing, on several grounds. We all know, that, in a young and flourishing State like ours, time and circumstances—and a very short time, too—produce wonderful changes. And suppose, that, after a county has been organized, and the population increased, and the people are all satisfied that a great improvement might be effected by changing the boundaries of their county, and they want to do so; here is a constitutional provision which says it shall not be done.

Now, I have thought a great deal about this matter, and the only fair and impartial conclusion that I can come to is, that that section has no business in the Constitution at all. [Applause.] But let that be as it may, I do insist that it is unfair to tie up the hands of the people in that way that they never can organize their counties to suit themselves.

Mr. KELSO. I wish to make one single remark in reply to what fell from my friend from Dearborn. It is quite true, in all probability, as remarked by him, that, when it was sought to organize the county of Ohio, there was some considerable objection made in regard to the high waters of Laughery Creek. During the spring, the back water flows up that creek for a long distance, and I believe it is very troublesome. But, sir, all that taken together does not change its true character. A portion of the year it is low; and the reason I made the remark which I did in regard to its navigableness, was to show that it divided the lands of the county, and that section lines did not terminate at the creek. Now, sir, much stress is laid upon the trouble which we have had in times past on the subject of county boundaries. Admitting all that to be true, I hold that it is a matter which properly appertains to the people and the Legislature; and I say again that we ought to leave it in their hands for them to decide for themselves.

Now, I agree with the remark of my friend, that that section has no business in the Constitution at all. There is no necessity for one word of it. But if it is to be there, let it be so modified that the people, under circumstances that may be necessary, shall have the power to arrange this business to suit their own convenience.

Mr. ROBINSON. When this question was under consideration the other day, I moved to strike out the section entirely, observing at the time that I looked upon it as neither more nor less than an attempt, not merely to abridge, but in a manner almost entirely to take away one of the most sacred popular rights. I mean the right of petition. I endeavored on that occasion to point out the inequality and injustice which the adoption of that section would forever hereafter produce. I say now, as I said then, that I regard it as a palpable violation of the rights of the people, because one of the rights of the people, by the Constitution, is the right to correct former wrongs and remedy former grievances by legislative enactments; and let me say, sir, that, by the bill of rights, it is provided that the people shall have the right of petitioning the Legislature for the redress of their grievances. That these grievances exist in many parts of the State, and that they always will exist under the adoption of that clause of the Constitution, is a matter that must be conceded. Then the question presents itself—and it is one worthy of the consideration of this Convention—is it right, by a provision of the organic law, for us to take from the people the right to petition the Legislature for a redress of their grievances, because some of them, or of this body, may have peculiar notions of their own? Now, the case referred to by the gentleman who submitted this amendment is one, and that involved in a petition which I presented here some time since, accompanied by a diagram, is another. Such cases exist in many parts of the State of Indiana. Why, sir, by this section we virtually say to the people: “You shall help to sustain the government; you shall pay your State and county revenue; but you shall be gagged; your wants may amount to grievances; your locality and situation may be such that you are not on an equal footing in many rights with other citizens of the State, yet your mouths shall be shut, and you shall not have a right to come here in your sovereign capacity and petition for a redress of your grievances.” This, sir, is unjust, and strikes at the right of petition. Sir, this section is arbitrary in its character; it is unjust in its operation; it is contrary to the spirit and genius of our government, and to the rights and privileges of freemen; and it ought not to exist as a part of our organic law. This is one of those questions which can be safely entrusted to the people, and one on which no general law ought to prevail, because the local situation of the people, and these local grievances in regard to county bounds, is of such a character that legislation can only afford them proper relief.

This, sir, is a domestic question. It is one which involves the rights of every individual; and although I have listened to every gentleman who has had anything to say in favor of this section, I have not yet heard one plausible reason why this power should be taken from the people—not one. I know that my friend from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) is against it, and that he has strong prejudices, perhaps, from the fact that there has been much litigation on the subject between two or three counties; and perhaps he told the truth when he said that perjury had been committed in regard to some of the surveys involved in the controversy about Dearborn county bounds. But, because perjury has been committed—if it has been the case—is that any reason why a law should be passed to prevent other men, in future, from enjoying their natural rights and privileges? I think not.

But, sir, there is another view of the question, which gentlemen appear to have overlooked, and that is that when the administration of the law does not operate upon the people equally, they are very apt to take the law into their own hands, and they will be heard over the Constitution and everything else.

Sir, they will enforce these rights; they will have justice; they will not submit to wrong. Can any of the old counties complain? I see no ground of complaint that can possibly originate in any of the old counties. If it is true that the old county of Dearborn lost a part of her territory for the creation of a new county, and thereby lost a part of her revenues, it should be remembered that it was done to suit the convenience of a part of the people of that county, who were very much inconvenienced by the then existing arrangements. If a new county is formed to suit the convenience of citizens, and to redress the grievances and inconveniences under which they are laboring, it should be borne in mind that the burdens have to be borne by the people who ask for it. And shall we tell them that although you are willing to put a burden upon yourselves, and to bear all the expense which will be entailed upon you by such an arrangement, yet we, the Constitutional Convention of the State of Indiana, have formed a determination that in all future time we will place a gag in your mouths, and you shall not be heard on any such subjects? Sir, would this be right?

As I remarked the other day, in the few observations I then made, I was satisfied from the tone of feeling manifested by the Convention, that my attempt to have the section stricken out would be unsuccessful. With the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) I am fully of opinion that if the Convention is determined not to strike it out and leave it an open question for the people themselves, with the aid of the Legislature to decide upon, it ought at least to be subject to reasonable modification; and in order to make the relief more general and not out of any enmity to the proposition of the gentleman from Spencer, (Mr. Huff,) I will submit the following as an amendment to the instructions:

“That the General Assembly in the formation of a new county shall not reduce the county or counties out of which said new county shall be taken to a less extent than three hundred square miles; nor shall any new county containing a less area than two hundred square miles be formed, nor unless a petition of a majority of the legal voters residing in the territory of which it is proposed to form such new county.”

In submitting this amendment, Mr. President, allow me to say that I think it is one which embraces what I believe to be nothing more than a principle of justice and equity. It leaves to every section of the State the right to complain upon just grounds, and it leaves, also, the people in the possession of the right to govern themselves, and to petition their representatives for a redress of their grievances.—A right, sir, which should be held sacred and inviolate—a right dear to every freeman—a right that should never be abridged—the most valuable right secured by a republican government—a right purchased by our forefathers, and which should never be taken away from the people—these are my notions, my feelings, my sentiments; I submit them for what they are worth, with an honest conviction that they are correct in principle.

Mr. BUTLER said, he fully concurred in the remarks which had been made both by the gentleman from Decatur and the gentleman from Switzerland, and in illustration of their argument he wished to present the position of his county to the Convention. The county which he represented contained four hundred and eighty-one square miles. The White River ran through the centre. The people both of the eastern and western part of the county were equally anxious to have it divided for their mutual convenience. But if that section were adopted it would for ever put it out of their power to have the county divided. Many persons had to go a distance of twenty-seven or twenty-eight miles to reach their county seat, whereas, if the county were divided, it would bring the county seat within a reasonable distance of each inhabitant. Unless the section, therefore, was materially amended, he would be under the necessity of voting against it.

Mr. KENT moved that the section and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved the previous question, but the call was not sustained.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would like to say a very few words on this subject, and I assure the Convention that had I not been on the committee which reported this section, I would not trespass upon their time for a moment. Being Chairman of that committee, it may be supposed that I was in favor of that section. To set myself right, I will say that I was not in favor of the report as I made it myself, but that I was in favor of the original provision of the old Constitution; and that provides that no old county shall be reduced to a less extent than four hundred square miles in the formation of a new one. I think that that provision would answer all the purposes for which such a provision was originally intended, and I would leave the question open for the people and the Legislature to settle among themselves any alteration beyond what is therein provided, that may hereafter be proposed.

Now in regard to what fell from the gentlemen from Dearborn and Switzerland, (Messrs. Watts and Kelso,) in relation to the dividing line between the counties of Ohio and Dearborn, leaving entirely out of the question the manner in which the county of Ohio was organized, there can be no doubt that the present line is exceedingly inconvenient, and if it was allowed to the Legislature to settle the county boundaries, I have no doubt that they would be arranged to the mutual satisfaction of both parties.

Then, sir, I will conclude by saying, that for myself I am in favor of the old constitutional provision, and if any gentleman will move to refer the section back again to the committee with instructions to report the provision of the old Constitution on the subject, I will vote with him for that end; but I am opposed to leaving the question entirely open, so that the boundaries of all our counties would be subject to continual disarrangement by the votes and petitions of the people.

Mr. HALL. I am in favor of the original instructions offered by the gentleman from Spencer, and against the amendment. The present provision of the Constitution secures to all the old counties an area of four hundred square miles. Now the county that I reside in contains more than four hundred square miles; but the first proposition introduced by the gentleman from Spencer is, that where two or more counties wish to create a third county, and the majority of the voters in the counties from which the territory is to be taken are in favor of it, they shall have the privilege of creating a new county. Now that appears to me to be a proposition so reasonable that no man can object to it. I think this is a privilege which ought, in such case, to be extended to them. I think the section as reported by the committee is altogether too strong. I cannot vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, but I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Spencer is so reasonable that no gentleman ought to object to it.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Robinson, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the instructions that have been offered by the gentleman from Spencer. "That the committee on county and township organization report a section providing that no county shall hereafter be reduced in territory for any purposes whatever, unless in the pursuance of the determination of a majority of the legal voters of such county at a general election, expressing the extent and purposes of such reduction."

The county of Dearborn is one of those counties in which difficulties resulting from the provision of the old Constitution have arisen. Now, sir, allow me to say that if we were making a Constitution that is to last for ten, or fifteen, or twenty years only, it might be proper to adopt a provision that the boundaries of counties as they now are should remain permanent. But when it is remembered that we are making a Constitution, the effects of which may last for centuries, and which itself may last for half a century, it is important that we should look to the future and endeavor to see what time may develop in regard to the necessary changes. The object of the section as reported by the committee is evidently to limit the exercise of power. Now I may have no objection to limit the legislative, the judicial, or executive departments of the Government. The greater degree of limitation here, if consistent with the due exercise of the public will, the better the interests of the people will be guarded; but where it is proper for the people, in their character as sovereigns, to express an opinion, the limitation is unwise and impolitic. It is not proposed by the instruction I have read to empower the Legislature to do a certain act, but it is a proposition securing to the people of a county the right to determine, by a direct vote, whether their county shall be reduced in territory or not. The question then is, is it improper to entrust this power in the hands of the people. A majority of the people of a county would in all cases be influenced only by a desire to act as to produce the greatest convenience to the greatest number of the citizens. I think, therefore, that it is not improper to confer this right upon the people, or rather to secure to them a right which is unquestionably their's. When it comes to a question of limiting the legislative power, then I will fully concur in every proper restriction consistent with the due expression of the public will; but when it comes to a question of limiting the people in the exercise of their primary power of expressing their will in any instance in which that power may be safely exercised, let me ask gentlemen what arguments they have to offer? Take, for instance, the majority of the people of the county of Jefferson; if the people, by a direct vote, determine that it is politic to attach a portion of their county to another and adjoining county, will any man say that they have no right to do so? I think not.

It was correctly remarked by the gentleman from Switzerland that the territory of a county belongs to the people of a county, and it is a well recognized principle that the majority must rule, and ordinarily do rule, without injury to the interests of the minority. In fifteen or twenty years from this time the county which I have in part the honor to represent, will, in all probability, contain a population furnishing from ten to twelve thousand voters. At the present time it would be extremely unwise to divide that county, and I presume that were such a proposition now made to the people not a hundred men in the whole county would be found in favor of it. But when that county may be so increased in population as to give us ten or twelve thousand voters within its limits, then the propriety of a division may be a very different thing, as facilities for transacting business may not increase with the increase of population. The time of the people and the money of the people also can be saved if the population be sufficient to sustain a county without improper burdens of taxation, if the free ingress to the county seat be such as to facilitate their business and suit their convenience. When a county becomes densely populated its division may result greatly to the advantage of the people, and greatly to the diminution of their burdens in discharge of the various duties which devolve upon the citizens in their respective counties.

I think we should look to this question as one, the effects of which, are to be seen more in the future than in the present. I hope no gentleman will desire to make a Constitution which shall not last as long as that which we have assembled here to revise. What effect would such a restriction as this have in twenty-five years, when our counties have attained an immense increase of population. In ten or fifteen years hence it is more than probable that a reduction in the size of many of your counties will be extremely desirable; and in connection with this desirableness, if this power can be so vested as not to operate injuriously to the interests of the people, it should be so vested. I ask is there any impropriety in vesting the power in the hands of the people who are alone to be effected by it? ["Consent," "consent."]

Sir, if there is any gentleman on this floor who can advance a single argument in favor of limiting the power of the people where it is to be exercised in a matter that only affects themselves, then I admit that such argument should have full weight and effect; but unless there is such an argument, and unless such argument shows clearly the necessity of restriction, then I think we ought to leave this matter in the hands of the people. I am opposed to the instructions which have been offered by the gentleman from Spencer, and for this reason only; that I think they will produce only a partial rule—a principle incorporated in a Constitution should be general. Those which I have offered will, I think, meet every case.

MR. LOCKHART. MR. PRESIDENT, I have no local interests to subserve by advocating or opposing the reference proposed by my friend from Spencer (Mr. Huff). While I say this I cannot say that I am indifferent to the results of the vote about to be taken. My feelings are all with the mover of the reference. The division of counties, it is true ought, not to be encouraged, nor ought we unnecessarily to prevent it where a clear majority of the people are in its favor. I regard this, sir, as a question, over which the people themselves in the local jurisdictions ought to have control. I therefore trust that the proposition will receive the favorable action of this Convention, and that the section will be amended as proposed.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Holman, and a division being called for there were, for the amendment, ayes 37, noes 45.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

MR. OWEN. I know that there is an indisposition on the part of this Convention, to alter the section as it now stands; but I would ask gentlemen to consider for a moment whether this is to be regarded as a proper section now, even though it might be perfectly proper when the old Constitution was formed. We had then but few inhabitants in the State, and it was not desirable that the counties should be small. We have already had a large increase of population, and in all probability shall have a still greater increase during the next half century. And can we feel assured that during that half century no county ought to be reduced below an area of four hundred square miles? What is the proposition of the gentleman from Spencer (Mr. Huff)? It is that if the people of two or more counties, wish to make an alteration in their boundaries, and they are willing and agreed to do so, they should not be prevented by any Constitutional restriction. And shall the Convention say that the people of the two or more counties in such case, attending to their own business, doing that which can injure no one in the world but themselves—even if it should operate an injury to them—shall the Convention say that they shall not be allowed to do it? I hope not, sir.

It is known to the Convention, that on several occasions where a matter of principle was involved I have voted to take the responsibility. But this is no matter of principle; it is nothing more than a matter of convenience—a change of things. In regard to principles, you can make stringent rules; but in regard to convenience you cannot. Why, then, not leave this matter with the people and the Legislature? If it be desirable for the present to say that no county shall be reduced below the dimensions of four hundred square miles, cannot the Legislature pass an act to that effect, which shall remain in force until circumstances shall arise to render it necessary that it should be repealed? Most certainly. It may be right now, and may continue to be right for ten or twenty years to come, that no reduction should take place in our counties below the area named; but at the expiration of that time it may be necessary, and if this provision is adopted into the Constitution, the change cannot be made except by a very tedious process. I think if the Convention will take the matter into serious consideration, they will come to the conclusion that the proposition made by the gentleman from Spencer, is an exceedingly proper one, and perhaps better calculated, than any yet offered, to meet the views of the people on this subject.

Mr. NILES. I am aware, Sir, that my feelings do not coincide with those of the gentlemen who advocate the plan of leaving the subject of county boundaries an open question. It happens that many of those who oppose the section as it now stands, have local interests to subserve, and are looking to the probable division of certain counties, with a view to the benefits likely to result to particular towns or localities. I represent no such interests; and I desire for the sake of the public peace, no less than for the general good, in every respect, to see a stop put at once and forever, to all the angry controversies which have arisen in reference to the division of counties.

It is an unquestionable fact that many of our counties are already too small, while none of them are too large. They are hardly of half the size as in many of the older States. It was not unnatural, in the early settlement of the State, when the roads were nearly impassable and when a dozen miles was a considerable journey, that the people should have desired to be within a small distance of the county seat, and that the counties should have been prescribed within narrow limits. But I feel confident that in making them so small as they are, the Legislature did not wisely consult the permanent interests of the people. Why then should our small counties be divided merely to subserve temporary convenience, at the expense of permanent and substantial interests, and only to double the public burthens? It was suggested by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) that his county would by-and-by contain ten or twelve thousand voters and might with propriety, at no distant day, be sub-divided. Sir, the City of New York will by-and-by contain ten or twelve hundred thousand people; but what argument will that fact afford in favor of dividing the City into two? As our counties increase in the number of inhabitants, the facilities for intercommunication between the distant portions and the centre will increase in an equal or greater ratio. Even the present hardships and inconveniences complained of by the gentleman from Spencer, will soon be obviated. We have had for the last thirty years, no more fruitful source of unprofitable and angry controversy, than this question of county boundaries. The contest which resulted in cutting off from the county of Dearborn, the little county of Ohio, did undoubtedly, as suggested by my friend upon my right, (Mr. Watts,) cost the State one hundred thousand dollars; and although the interests of a small town and neighborhood may be temporarily advanced, I hazard nothing in the opinion that it would have been better for the substantial and permanent interests of all concerned, and especially of succeeding generations, that the limits of the original county should never have been disturbed.

No one regards it as an evil that the State boundary is fixed. The limits of the State being established, we know where to fix the capital, where to erect the public buildings. The people know where to concentrate railroads and other improvements, and where to build a city which will be an ornament to the State. Make your county boundaries permanent and the same will be true, on a similar scale, in regard to the county towns.

It will not be denied that most of the controversies in regard to county boundaries have originated in the hope of private gain. Let this question be left open, and in half the counties of the State a few interested men may be found, who, by perpetual agitation, will either induce the extremes of covntry to combine against each other or against the centre or contiguous portions of adjoining counties, to combine against other points. If they fail in their scheme one year, they will agitate the subject the next, and so on indefinitely. It will give rise to angry controversies which will swallow up all other questions. The county towns will maintain only a precarious existence. Nothing will be settled. Let us not then inflict a permanent injury upon successive generations for the sake of some temporary convenience or for purposes of pecuniary gain.

I can speak with perfect confidence for every county in the North, when I say any such agitation would be a misfortune. Efforts have been made several times to divide one of our best counties—Kosciusko. But any one who knows anything of the subject, is aware that the scheme originated in hopes of private speculation, and that a division of the county would have been a serious evil.

But it is said, why not trust this matter to the people: I am willing, sir, to trust them fully in what is peculiarly within their own province in conducting the government of the State, but I would not hold out to them motives to disregard the public interest for the sake of private gain.

I trust then that no such apple of discord will be thrown among the counties. I should regard it as a great calamity.

Mr. HALL. I must correct the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) in relation to those who defend this amendment making this a local question. The county which I represent is right upon this matter; and, although it contains some four hundred square miles, yet if any proposition were now made for a division of that county, I do not believe that it would receive ten votes in the county. The people in that county are right; but they being satisfied with their own situation are not disposed to tie up the hands of those who are not satisfied in relation to questions of this kind, but are willing to deal out justice to them. Now it appears to me that there are some counties on the Ohio river so situated that any one looking on the map, would be apt to suppose that a majority of the people of these counties would be favorable to a change in their boundaries. And if their situation be such as to render such change desirable for their own convenience the people certainly ought to have the privilege of making it, and that is all that is proposed by the gentleman from Spencer. The old counties are all secure, and if a majority of the people of one or more counties are in favor of any alteration let them have it. They have a right to have it. If a majority of the people of my county desired an alteration, I would say at once let them have it. ["Consent, consent."]

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to re-commit, with the instructions offered by the gentleman from Spencer.

Mr. KELSO. I do not want to make any more speeches, but to offer the following amendment as additional instructions:

"That the committee be further instructed to report a section instead of the present one, in substance like that contained in the present Constitution on the same subject, with leave to report the said section in the present Constitution in terms."

Mr. PRATHER moved to lay the instructions just offered by the gentleman from Switzerland, on the table;

Which was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion of the gentleman from Spencer, to re-commit the section with the instructions above inserted, and the yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered, were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foster, Gootee, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spana, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Beard, Berry, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Kilgore, Logan, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tannehill, Wallace, Watts, Wiley, and Zenor—49.

So the motion to re-commit was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I beg to offer the following proviso, as additional instructions:

"Provided, however, that the General Assembly shall have power to make such alterations in the boundaries of existing counties, as may be demanded by the public convenience, and of the inhabitants residing within the limits proposed to be changed by a majority of those inhabitants; and that such change shall not be made if the same shall be found materially to affect the permanent interests of the county or counties, the boundaries of which were proposed to be changed."

The instructions were, on motion, laid upon the table.

The question then recurred on the final passage of the remaining section of report number seven; and the yeas and nays being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gootee Graham of Miami, Hadson, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—116.

So the remaining sections were passed.

Mr. MILROY moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was decided in the negative.

THE PUBLIC MONEY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of report No. 8, being a report from the committee on finance and taxation, comprising two sections—the first, providing that no money shall be drawn from the treasury, except in consequence of appropriations made by law—and the second, that an accurate statement of the receipts and expenditures of the public money shall be attached to, and published with, the laws of each regular session of the General Assembly.

TAXING OF STATE AND OTHER STOCKS.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I wish to call the attention of the Convention to a subject which I deem of much importance. The great principle of equality in bearing the burdens, which society imposes upon its members, ought to stand forth in bold relief in every written Constitution. In order to carry out this principle, I shall move to re-commit the sections now under consideration, with instructions to incorporate with them the following sections:

SEC. — The Legislature shall provide by law a uniform rule of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as will secure a just valuation, for taxation, of all property, both real and personal, excepting only such for municipal, educational, benevolent, or religious purposes as may be specially exempted by law.

SEC. — Money invested in United States or State bonds, shall be taxed as money at interest, and all other stocks shall be taxed as personal property,

I believe that there is hardly a subject connected with our State government, which has attracted more general attention among the people, than the existing inequality in the assessment and taxation of property.

Governor Whitcomb, in his message of 1848, called the attention of the Legislature to the subject. He says:

“A slight examination of our present revenue system will be sufficient to demonstrate its susceptibility of improvement. Under its workings, it is quite manifest that a large amount of the invisible wealth of the community, such as corporation and other stock, cash on hand, or at interest, and the more portable and valuable kind of personal property, &c., is not found upon assessment rolls. This description of taxables is generally owned by those best able to pay, and their non-assessment leaves the burden of taxation so much the heavier on property, which is visible, and especially on lands which cannot escape notice and scrutiny, &c., which the true policy of our State requires should not be visited with disfavor. The assessment sheets of 1847, as compared with those of 1845, show a decrease in personal property, in some counties, of $20,000, in one county of $40,000, in another of $52,000, and in another of $75,000.”

Gov. Dunning, in his message, earnestly urged the same subject upon the consideration of the last General Assembly.

It appears to me, that no provisions are more proper for a Constitution, than those requiring equality of assessment for purposes of taxation. The duty of the Legislature to devise a system which will secure such equality and which will cause all the property of the State to be brought under taxation, should be held forth in the Constitution. Such provisions will strengthen the hands of those who are laboring to bring about a just and equal system. The principle of equality of taxation is as proper a subject of Constitutional enactment, as that of equality of political rights. Special privileges and exemption should belong to no class of persons, nor be attached to any species of property.

I have prepared these sections with some degree of care, and I think they will meet the object intended. According to the provisions contained in them, all the property of the State, whether belonging to individuals or to corporations, must be taxed—with what exception only? Why, school houses, churches, the property of municipal corporations, and property devoted to benevolent or eleemosynary purposes, so far as the Legislature may see fit to exempt such property. No property can be exempted, unless belonging to one or the other of the classes named in the exception, and unless, further, the Legislature shall, by law, declare that such property shall be exempted.

Now, I am aware, that no general rule laid down in the Constitution and laws, no matter with what stringency, will prevent property of some description, through fraud or concealment, escaping taxation. But that surely is no reason why we should not have the rule of exact equality in both the Constitution and the laws. The principle should be spread out in the fundamental law to be before the eyes of the people, and as directory to the Legislature.

The second section specifies a class of property most likely to elude taxation, and declare how it shall be taxed. It declares that all corporation stocks shall be taxed the same as any other personal property; and that the monies invested in State or United States bonds shall be taxed as money at interest. And why should they not be? Money loaned to the State or to the United States ought to be taxed just as money loaned to individuals.

I move that the sections under consideration be re-committed, with instructions to incorporate with them the sections which I have sent to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. BASCOM. I move to amend the instructions by adding the following: Stock in all other property or in banks, shall be taxed as all other property in this State is taxed.

Mr. COOKERLY. This appears to be a very important question, and one which appears to me to require serious deliberation: and, as it is now nearly dark, I move that the Convention adjourn.

Pending the question on the amendment offered by Mr. Bascom,

The Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 4, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. STEELE.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. KENT. Would it be in order, Mr. President, to move the re-consideration of a vote that was taken yesterday?

Mr. PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. KENT. Then, sir, I move the re-consideration of the vote upon the re-commitment of the section which provides that counties shall not be reduced below 400 square miles in extent. The section was re-committed yesterday with instructions so to amend as to provide that counties might be reduced below that standard, if a majority of the voters of two or more counties were desirous of forming a new one.

I have no intention (continued Mr. K.) to discuss the question, because it has been pretty thoroughly investigated already, but since the vote of last evening was taken I have become satisfied that it ought to be re-considered, and I have no doubt that other gentlemen are also satisfied that they have fallen into an error in giving that vote.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Before the vote is taken upon the re-consideration, I move that there be a call of the Convention. I perceive that many members are absent.

The question was put on the motion of the gentleman from Dubois, and the Convention refused to order the call.

The question then being on the motion of the gentleman from Floyd to re-consider the vote taken yesterday, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 64, nays 62—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Biddle, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Logan, Maguire, Mather, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Watts, Wiley, and Mr. President—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Butler, Chandler, Chenoweth, Conduit, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Gootee, Hall, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hugin, Huff, Kinley, Lockhart, March, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Rastine, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—62.

So the vote was re-considered.

The question then recurring on the re-commitment of the section with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Spencer—

Mr. GIBSON demanded the previous question, and by ayes 50, noes 42, the demand for the previous question was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. COOKERLY (addressing the Chair). Is it in order, sir, to move a call of the House?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOKERLY. Then I move that there be a call of the House.

The question was put on the motion of the gentleman from Vigo, and it was decided in the negative.

The question being, Shall the main question be now put?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 86, nays 45—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippécanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Logan, Maguire, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Terry, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Chandler, Conduit, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Gootee, Hall, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, March, McClelland, McFarland, Milroy, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Spann, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, and Yocum—45.

So the main question was ordered to be now put.

The demand for the previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put, the motion to re-commit with instructions was cut off, and the question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken under the vote, with the following result—yeas 90, nays 38—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippécanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Terry, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Lockhart, Milroy, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Spann, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, and Yocum—38.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

The committees were then called for reports; there being none—

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, the first thing in order being the motion of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) to re-commit the sections reported from the committee on finance, with instructions to add the following sections:

"SEC. —. The General Assembly shall by law provide a uniform rule of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as will secure a just valuation of all property, real and personal, except so much for municipal, educational, benevolent, or religious purposes, as may be specially exempted by law.

"SEC. —. Money invested in State or United States bonds, shall be taxed as money at interest, and all other stocks shall be taken as personal property."

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the instructions by adding the following section:

"SEC. —. The stock and all other property of banks shall be taxed as other property in this State is taxed."

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment to the instructions.

Mr. GIBSON. I think there is a decision of the United States courts that money invested in stocks is not taxable. I wish to call the attention of the Convention to this point.

Mr. DOBSON. I will merely remark, so as to prevent any misunderstanding, that it occurred to me yesterday that there was a provision in the Constitution of the United States, that prohibits the taxing of stocks. And upon looking at it, there is no doubt in my mind about the construction to be given to it. So far as I am concerned, I am for taxing all property, whether in money or otherwise, for the support of the government. But upon looking at the Constitution of the United States, we find that we are prohibited from doing many things that we might consider it very desirable to do. I think, perhaps, we are going a little further in this matter than we have power to go, although, if we had the power, I should be in favor of exercising it. But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided this question. The decision is, that a State has no power to tax the Bank of the United States, because they have no power to restrain the Constitutional means given to the government to execute Constitutional ends.

And again, no State can control the exercise of any authority under the General Government.

In the same manner, it has been decided that a State has no power to tax stocks issued for loans to the United States.

Mr. GIBSON. What case is that?

Mr. DOBSON. It is the case of Wharton against the city council of Charleston.

A MEMBER. Read the decision.

Mr. DOBSON read as follows:

"A State has no power to tax stock issued for loans to the United States."

And again, there is another decision. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in the case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland, that the Bank of the United States has a Constitutional right to establish offices of discount and deposit within the States; and further, that the States cannot tax the branches—they have no right to tax any of the Constitutional means used by the Government to effect Constitutional ends.

There are a great many things that we would like to do, that we are prohibited from doing. It would have been very desirable for the people of the western country, to have had the right to purchase lands from the Indians; but the Government of the United States, had taken that matter under its own control, and reserved to itself the exclusive right, to control that matter.

It would be very desirable for Indiana, and other States, to regulate their own militia, but this is a matter that the General Government reserves to itself. It is very desirable to have the right to do many other things that I might enumerate, but we have surrendered certain rights, and we cannot now take them back. It is one of the attributes of sovereignty to take care of itself, to make use of all the means necessary for its perpetuation, and for the protection of its citizens or subjects, and to enable it to enforce its own decrees, and carry out its own will; and to enable the General Government to do this, it has the exclusive right to coin money, declare war, contract debts, and to do other necessary things, to enable it to discharge all its various duties. I am not quite clear upon this point, but according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, up to the present time, it does appear to me that the power to tax stocks of the United States, does not belong to the Legislature of the State; it is a thing over which we have no control. The Legislature of a State has no power to control the issue of treasury notes, bonds, or anything of that sort by the General Government, or to prevent them from putting them into the market; and it is beyond the reach of the State authority to tax them after they are put into the market. That is my opinion, from the examination that I have given the subject.

Now, if a State had the power to tax the revenue of the General Government; if it had the power to levy a tax of one per cent. upon the United States bonds that might be found in it, then she would have the right to levy a tax of twenty; and if twenty, then she might go to fifty or a hundred per cent; and in that way, indirectly prohibit the General Government from raising means to prosecute a war or any other necessary enterprise. It is very clear that we have no such power, though we are now making provision for taxing all the property in the State, and I am for taxing all we have the power to tax. I ask the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) if he intends to tax the Government lands in Indiana? I think he will not go so far as that. Well, if you cannot tax the property of the General Government in one shape, I ask, can you in another? If you cannot tax the real estate of the Government, can you tax the personal property, if you choose to call it so? I think not. Again, is there any consistency in the matter? Does Indiana tax all the property of the State? Does she tax the land mortgaged by her citizens to the Sinking Fund, and forfeited to her, or purchased in by her, after they are forfeited? There would be an inconsistency in it. She does not do it. The General Government does not pay tax on her means. There would be no propriety in Indiana levying a tax upon her own property. It would cost more than it would come to. I might go on and refer to other decisions bearing upon this point. We owe allegiance to the General Government, for we are protected by it. It not only protects us at home, but follows and protects us everywhere, and no law or code of laws Indiana could pass, would dissolve that allegiance. No act of the Legislature of the State can discharge the liability of one of its citizens to pay a debt, contracted with a citizen of a neighboring State, though Indiana may pass a law discharging him from the obligation of a contract with another citizen of Indiana.

I have no objection to this section being referred as a matter of inquiry, and if we have the power, I am willing that stock shall be taxed, but if we have not the power, we should not attempt to pass any such provision.

Mr. BORDEN. The question before the Convention, is one that really deserves a serious consideration. To fix upon a just and equal system of representation and taxation, is acknowledged to be two of the most difficult things in the art of government.

The question of taxing stocks in this country, is very similar in character, to the system of income tax in the mother country. For the same reason that the incomes of those who are living on the stocks issued by the English Government are taxed—that is for liquidation of the expenses of government—should we in like manner impose a tax upon those holding the stocks of this Government. Then, sir, the burden of taxation would be sensibly decreased.

Could all the stocks now held in the State, bear their just proportion of taxation, it would relieve the agricultural interests of the State from a large amount of taxation, which they are now compelled to bear. It is easy for assessors to ascertain the amount of property belonging to men living on small farms, with but little means—and such property is always taxed at its full value. This, however, has not been the case with the more wealthy capitalists of the State. If there was a just and equal system of taxation in force, I have no doubt that from three to five hundred thousand dollars would be brought into the State treasury annually, more than is now brought in.

The gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) remarked that Government had the right to borrow money, and for that purpose issued stocks; and if we taxed that stock, we would thus restrict the General Government in the exercise of one of its powers. The fallacy of this argument is very evident, for we do not tax the stocks of the United States, but we tax the persons holding them—tax the amount of money invested in those stocks, as personal property. As well might we say, because Government possesses the power to coin money, and proceeds to coin money for individuals—that therefore, we could not tax the money thus coined and in the hands of individuals, for the reason that it would be interfering with the exercise of the powers of the General Government.

I do not consider the position of the gentleman a correct one—one that can be sustained by good authority. I believe if the State should impose a tax on such property it could be collected, no matter whether invested in United States stock, or in the stock of any of the States of the Union. I am aware that in the case of the old United States Bank it has been decided that the stock of the General Government held by that bank could not be taxed; but I do not think that that decision is applicable to this case. I know there has been considerable dispute as to whether the custom houses and other public buildings held by the United States, are taxable or not; and the General Government to secure itself against taxation in all cases where the State governments have ceded buildings for the use of the United States, has required that with the cession should be granted the right of the exemption of the property from taxation.

The question in this Convention has been asked whether the public lands of the United States can be taxed? To this I reply, while belonging to the United States of course not; but the moment individuals purchase them then they become the property of individuals, and as such, liable to taxation. I hope, sir, that a provision will be inserted in the Constitution requiring every species of property to be subject to taxation at its real value, except in the isolated cases of the property of religious and charitable institutions.

Why, sir, take the Treasury notes increased by the Government of the United States a few years since, and will it be contended in regard to them that an individual holding them did not have in his possession money as much as if they were the issue of a bank? and for one I see no reason why the investment of property in government stocks should be exempted from taxation when individuals having United States Treasury notes in their hands are liable to be taxed to the amount of those notes. For my part I think that both United States stocks and Treasury notes are liable to taxation, but as an impression has gone forth that they are not liable to taxation, I have thought that some principle fixing that matter should be inserted in the Constitution.

Mr. NAVE. I wish to call upon the gentleman from Monroe to withdraw his propositions in the form of instructions and allow them to be submitted to the Convention in the form of a resolution, that it may go to a committee, and that committee consult the necessary authorities as to the power of this State, under the Constitution of the United States, to levy a tax upon United States stock. I suppose that it will not be controverted on this floor that this Convention in making the organic law of the State has no power to levy a tax upon stocks issued by the United States. It is immaterial, sir, whether they have passed into the hands of individuals or not. I wish to be understood distinctly on this point, that this Convention has no power to levy a tax or to authorize the Legislature of Indiana to levy a tax to be collected out of the bonds of the United States. I believe such a tax, sir, would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. We have no more power to levy a tax upon government stock than we have to levy a tax upon lands belonging to the Federal Government. We have no more power under the Government of the United States in the one instance than in the other. Therefore, sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe is clearly in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. This fact, sir, has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States from time to time, that to tax the property of the Federal Government which is thrown into market by their own act is unconstitutional. In view of this fact, sir, this is an important question; one that should be fully matured before the Convention act upon it.

For that reason I prefer that the whole proposition should be withdrawn and a mere resolution of inquiry substituted and presented to the Convention, and then sent to an appropriate committee for their examination; the committee to report such a proposition as will be in conformity with the Constitution of the United States; one that will reach every description of property that we have power to levy a tax upon.

I suppose this would be all that the gentleman from Monroe, and other gentlemen would desire.

The Convention can then report a section that will levy an equitable tax upon the citizens of this State, so that no injustice will be done in future to our citizens in making some pay who own land the future revenue of the State, and others having their property invested in stock pay nothing. If the gentleman then will withdraw his proposition he can have his object attained in a different way. I see no particular necessity of incorporating this principle in the present section when it can be inserted in some other section of the Constitution just as well. Thus there will be no necessity of re-committing the section he now proposes to incorporate into the Constitution.

If the gentleman from Monroe refuses to adopt such a plan as I have proposed, I can only say that I shall feel bound to vote against his instructions, for I look upon them as a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have noticed that the Governors of our State in their annual messages for a number of years past, have called the attention of the Legislature, and the people of the State at large, to the great inequality of assessment and taxation as existing under our laws. In many parts of the State the subject has excited much attention. This is true of the district which I represent. If there is any political truth which may be regarded as an axiom, it is that the burdens of supporting government should fall in just proportions upon those who enjoy its benefits. There is manifest injustice in permitting property, in the hands of the wealthy, which ought to be taxed as other property, to escape taxation altogether, or to be taxed only on a very small part of its value. Some facts have come to my personal knowledge which have astonished me. Upon examining the Auditor's duplicate in my own county, I noticed farms which were of equal value assessed at a difference of fifty per cent., and farms of less value than other farms, assessed at a much higher rate. The same inequality exists in regard to counties. Some counties escape their proper proportion of taxes, while others pay, as a consequence, too much. Indeed the evil has become one no longer to be endured.

I do not suppose, sir, that these inequalities can be corrected by the Constitution, nor even wholly by the laws. But I would lay down the rule in the Constitution. It will be in the minds of the people. It will be before the Legislature. It will strengthen those who wish to secure a system of just and equal taxation. The rule will be a part of the organic law, and the people and the Legislature will endeavor to work up to a rule so manifestly just and equitable. If the rights of society are to be equal—if men are to stand upon the same platform—if none are to enjoy special privileges or exemptions which others do not enjoy, let the rule requiring it go into the Constitution. Whatever else we omit, let us not omit a principle so fundamental in its character, and lying at the very foundation of free government.

In examining this subject I have had occasion to look into the Constitutions of other States, and especially into the Constitutions of States where the subject has attracted most attention. It is well known that in the State of Ohio there has been much agitation in consequence of a special rule having been established for the taxation of a particular class of property. I mean bank property. I have examined the report of the committee of their Constitutional Convention on finance and taxation. That committee reports United States stocks as well as State stocks as subjects of taxation.

It is to me a strange doctrine, that, in this country, a man may invest his money in any kind of stocks, and claim for it an exemption from taxation. It runs athwart all my notions of justice and right, that any one may live in our midst—may enjoy the full protection of Government—invest his money in the safest funds known in the country, and yet entirely escape taxation. He may, according to this doctrine, have the best fortune in Indiana, and pay on it not a dime to support the Government which surrounds him with safety. The poor man, who hardly knows the meaning of the word stock, must be taxed for all he has; but the man having his Government stocks, though amounting to thousands, utterly escapes taxation. You cannot anywhere find the poor man who asks exemption for any of his little property. All that he asks is, that others should be taxed as himself. And they ought to be so taxed. Who will say that the very safest property in the State shall go untaxed—that property which is found only in the hands of those most able to pay?

I much doubt whether there is any decision of the United States' Courts which will prevent any State from taxing the money of its citizens invested in Government loans, any more than money invested in loans to individuals. I do not profess to have looked for decisions in the matter. I know well that there is no country on the globe where government stocks are not taxed. It is so in Great Britain and France, and it should be so, everywhere. If a decision has ever been made, that a State cannot tax the money of its citizens invested in United States' bonds, I feel quite sure that it is just such a decision as will be reversed.

It is said we do not tax Government lands, and, by parity of reasoning, we should not tax Government stocks. Now, sir, by special compact, we are inhibited from doing this. When, as a State, we entered the confederacy by contract, we agreed not to do it.

Mr. DOBSON. For five years.

It is not property belonging to the United States, sir, that I claim ought to be taxed. Any question of that kind I do not propose to discuss. It is property belonging to individuals which I hold taxable. If, by United States' bonds, were meant bonds belonging to the General Government, the question would wear a different aspect. But it is moneys loaned by citizens of the State to the United States, constituting in the hands of those citizens a most valuable kind of property, which I hold ought to be taxed just as property of the same class in the hands of their fellow-citizens. Until that is done, there can be no equality of taxation.

It is extraordinary, and beyond all my conceptions, that demands are made in behalf of that very property best able, under all difficulties and hazards, to pay, yielding a certain profit, and never found, except in the hands of the rich.

This subject I have brought forward with the sole view of securing simple justice in the matter of taxation. It concerns every citizen in Indiana. I little expected it would meet the determined opposition which it has encountered at the very threshold.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know, Mr. President, that I have any objection to the general proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) if properly regulated; yet, I believe it is improper for this Convention to undertake to regulate taxation. This course has been adopted by but very few States as a constitutional provision. The report read by the gentleman from Monroe was one made in the Constitutional Convention of Ohio, but has not yet been acted upon.

The subject of taxation is one of great interest—one that we are sensitive upon, and probably more so than on any other. There is no one question, probably, that the people would like so much to control themselves as the subject of taxation. And it is with them that I should prefer to leave it, to be regulated and modified at their pleasure. Here it will be found to be entirely safe; and, in my humble opinion, can be safe nowhere else.

The proposition of the gentleman from Monroe is: that the United States' stocks and Indiana State stocks shall be taxed as money at interest, and that other stocks shall be taxed as personal property. Now, sir, there is a manifest inequality and consequent injustice in the first of these propositions. United States' stocks are worth, say one hundred and nine dollars. This amount is paid by the purchaser; yet, in paying tax, he would only pay on one hundred dollars, while, in justice, he should pay on one hundred and nine. But the injustice of the provision is still more apparent. Indiana stocks are probably worth seventy-five dollars to the hundred; yet the purchaser of Indiana stocks would have to pay on one hundred dollars for what cost and is worth but seventy-five dollars. Thus is easily seen the injustice of the proposition. One hundred and nine dollars, vested in United States' stocks, would be assessed for taxable purposes at one hundred dollars; seventy-five dollars, vested in Indiana State stocks, would be assessed for the same purpose at one hundred dollars.

Mr. READ of Monroe. A man may receive ten or twenty dollars on a note, by way of interest, and still he has not only to pay taxes to the full amount of the note, and at what its market value, with interest added, might be, but upon the original amount.

Mr. STEVENSON. A man only receives six per cent. here for money at interest. The law prevents his receiving more. Although I am in favor of taking stock under proper regulations, yet, from what I have shown, it will be seen that there is danger in making constitutional provisions on the subject; because, if we are not exactly right, there will be no remedy until another Convention.

If the gentleman will withdraw his instruction, and simply refer his proposition to a committee, I shall not object; although I prefer leaving the whole subject of taxation to the Legislature.

A very large majority of our tax-payers are farmers and property holders; they constitute, at the same time, a large majority of the voters of the country; the Legislature, consequently, will always be under their control, so that I have no fears that stocks will escape their due proportion of taxation, even if there should be no constitutional provision on the subject.

But there is another reason, sir, why this matter should be left with the Legislature, and that is that there is a large amount of stock in this county about the taxation of which a just discrimination should be made. Companies have been incorporated for the purpose of constructing plank roads for the benefit of the public. Men take one or two hundred dollars' worth of stock in them, not for the purpose of making money thereby, but to subserve the interest of their immediate neighborhood; more as a gift than anything else. If that kind of stock is to be taxed the same as personal property, these improvements will not be made. This whole matter then should be left to the Legislature, and they can make such proper exceptions as the interests of the State may require.

It will be perceived, sir, by reference to the constitutions of other States, that as regards this proposition if it is adopted we will be traveling over an entirely new ground. It will be dangerous then for us to meddle with it, while on the other hand it will be safe with the Legislature.

I think, sir, we should adopt some general rules by which to be governed in the ingrafting principles into the Constitution. It will be found difficult to incorporate everything into the Constitution that is right, for the reason that it will make it too large. I do not know any better rule for our guidance in this matter than where a thing can be safely left with the people for their action to leave it. If it is dangerous to leave it with the people why then we can put it in the Constitution under such restrictions as we may deem proper. We must adopt some general principle of this kind in regard to the Constitution we are framing, or else we will make it a revised statute.

Reference has been made to the action of the Constitutional Convention in the State of New York, but it amounts to nothing. The provisions of the Constitutions of the States of New York and Wisconsin both, as well as of the other States of the Union, clearly show that we are attempting to do that which no other States in the Union are doing. I think the terms of the provision in the Constitution of Wisconsin embraces all that we can properly do on this subject.

The following is their constitutional provision on this subject:

"The rule of taxation shall be uniform, and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the Legislature shall prescribe."

If we go further it will be found that there is great danger of involving the subject in difficulties that it will be difficult to get rid of. New York in her Constitution has even done less than this. Here is all that I find in her Constitution upon this subject:

"Every law which imposes, continues, or revives a tax, shall distinctly state the tax, and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object."

Mr. HOVEY. I think that upon examination these instructions will be found to be of a purely legislative character. There is a section already in our statute covering this whole ground. I will read it:

"The terms 'personal estate,' and 'personal property,' as used in this chapter, shall be construed to include all household furniture, goods, chattels, and moneys, all ships and vessels, whether at home or abroad; all moneys at interest owing to the persons to be taxed more than they pay interest for, and all other debts owing to them from solvent persons more than they are indebted for all public stocks, stocks in turnpikes, bridges, insurance companies, and moneys, corporations, whether within or without this State; also such portions of the capital of incorporated companies liable to taxation on their capital as shall not be invested in real estate."—Page 208 Rev. Stat. 1843, sec. 4.

By this section it will be observed that it embraces everything that is proposed to be obtained by these instructions.

The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) will perceive that the stocks which he proposes to make liable to taxation are embraced within the section I have just read, and that it is, therefore, unnecessary to frame any constitutional provision on that subject.

The instructions further say that the Legislature shall pass uniform laws in regard to taxation. I would inquire, sir, if we have not laws of that character now? Wherein are the present laws not uniform? Will the adoption of these instructions make them uniform? Laws not uniform now cannot be made so by the adoption of these instructions. If you adopt sections embracing these instructions the Legislature will have to pass new laws under them which will be of the same character as those now existing, and, therefore, there can be no practical benefit attained by the adoption of these instructions. The revised code settles this matter, and needs not the further action of this body.

Mr. BASCOM. I find no provision in the section offered by the gentleman from Monroe, taxing the stock and property of banks. Now I shall not do as he has done, go into the discussion of the propriety of taxing United States stocks. I leave that for the investigation of legal gentlemen.

Now, sir, I take the ground that in fixing upon the taxable property of this State we should include bank stock and property. If any gentleman will take the trouble to examine the reports of the State Bank of Indiana, he will see how much property they have exempted from taxation. This fact, sir, a most nefarious one too—has been brought to my notice more particularly in one of the counties which I represent. It will be seen that the Bank owns in the State some two hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, independent of its banking houses. The Bank owns considerable landed property in one of the counties I represent—and that property is not subject to taxation for county or road purposes whatever. In that county, a man who owns a small piece of land has to pay a tax of one dollar and ninety cents for every one hundred dollars' worth of real property. This is a most tremendous tax; a heavy burden upon the people of new counties; while the Bank owns hundreds of acres in that county, it pays not one cent into the county treasury; and, sir, this state of things is not confined to that county alone. If any one will take the trouble to examine further, they will find one hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars' worth of property, independent of the banking houses, which are not taxed. I find, sir, from the report of the State Treasurer, that the Bank only pays five thousand dollars tax for State purposes. If, sir, the landed property and stock of this Bank was taxed as private property is taxed, there would accrue yearly a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of the State Government.

There is no inducement for a man to invest his money in real estate in this country, on account of the heavy tax—and he has only to invest his money in the stock of the Bank, and he is entirely free from taxation. Thus, sir, the capital of the State is exempt from taxation and the labor of the country is made to bear the burthen of the State taxes.

Yet gentlemen will get up and say that this matter should be left to the Legislature. I am instructed to say that so long as this matter is before the House, it shall no longer be overlooked—so that the capitalists of the State shall hereafter be exempt from taxation. Not only that, sir, but I shall advocate that the banking houses of the State be taxed. This matter, sir, heretofore has been left to the Legislature, and this is the reason why nothing has been done. I desire to strike at the root of the evil. I want to repeal the decision in the fifth volume of Blackford's Reports, page 195, in reference to the taxation of bank property. You will find there, under the decision of the Supreme Court of Indiana, the decision that the property of the State Bank is not taxable. This matter should be specially provided for in the Constitution, and then the Supreme Court will not have the power to decide that the property of banks should not be taxed. Sir, this is unjust—it is bearing down upon the energies of the people—upon the hardy yeomanry of the State; and all, too, for the benefit of capitalists.

Mr. HOVEY. The State Bank has a particular charter, which is a contract which cannot be repealed by this Convention.

Mr. BASCOM. I was showing what evils we now labor under and there is no reason why we should not put a stop to all similar encroachments in the future. If we have been swindled heretofore—if we have suffered this Bank and capital generally to get clear of taxation—is there any reason why we should be governed in the future by the same rule? There is nothing, sir, that shows greater injustice—that cries out louder for reform, in regard to the interests of the State, than this power of taxation. We are all striving to do something to alleviate the burthens of the people—to relieve the people of a tremendous burthen of taxation, and can we adopt a better policy than to strike at the capital of the State, and make it bear its share of the burthen?

This, then, sir, is a question of great importance. I am willing it should go to a committee for investigation. I desire that it should be examined. I am satisfied that if gentlemen will take the trouble to look over the reports of this Bank and figure for themselves the amount of property it has exempted from taxation, that they will seek to remedy this great and growing evil.

Now, sir, is the proper time to do this, when we have the power and the opportunity. I ask gentlemen to reflect upon the subject and consider whether they are willing further to allow the people of the State, who are land-owners, to bear all the expenses of government, and that the wealthy capitalist shall be exempted from paying his share of these expenses? If we do not attend to this matter now, and leave it for the Legislature, the evil will continue in the future as it has prevailed in the past.

Mr. McFARLAND. This is a very important question, sir, and I am glad it has been brought before the Convention. It will be recollected, sir, by many of the members, that some weeks since I offered a resolution upon the subject of taxation. It was a resolution of inquiry, and was referred to the committee on finance and taxation. If this subject is again referred to that committee, sir, it should be unaccompanied by any definite instructions. They should be allowed some latitude of action upon the question, so as to secure some degree of uniformity in taxation.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I will modify my section as soon as opportunity is afforded me.

Mr. McFARLAND. With such a modification as I have suggested, I will sustain the gentleman's motion with pleasure. I am satisfied from the experience of the past—whatever may be the opinion of other gentlemen, that there should be a uniform mode of taxation. The Legislature from time to time, sir, has exempted first one species of property, and then another, until it has become a great abuse. Scattered over this State, sir, is a large amount of property, which there is no more propriety in exempting from taxation, than there is in exempting the private property of individuals.

I ask gentlemen why the Masonic Hall, which it was proposed to hire for our deliberations, should be exempted from taxation under the statute of this State. There is a large amount of property throughout the State which, under various pretexts, is exempted from taxation, when there is no good reason for it. I was first led to reflect upon this subject from the fact that I belonged to a secret association in which this question of exemption from taxation was mooted, and I came to the conclusion, that all such exemption, was unjust to the balance of the citizens of the State. The amount of property for which charitable and benevolent and other institutions have claimed and received exemption from taxation, is immense, and the amount is increasing. The Legislature have not been stringent enough upon the subject. It is best then, to insert in the organic law of the State a fixed and definite rule on this subject, beyond the limits of which the Legislature shall have no discretion. With the modification made by the gentleman from Monroe to his motion I have no objection to the reference.

Mr. WALPOLE offered the following amendment, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) on yesterday:

[The amendment was, in substance, a provision for a more uniform mode of taxation. The reporter was unable to obtain it.]

Mr. LOCKHART. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wells, and the gentleman from Hancock, that they withdraw their amendments for the present, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Monroe to modify his motion as he has proposed. They can then offer their amendments to the instructions, thus saving a good deal of trouble and unnecessary voting.

The amendments were accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I desire, sir, to say a word to my friend from Posey (Mr. Hovey). He thinks the present law sufficient for the purpose of securing a just and equal assessment, and a uniform mode of taxation. Well, I can only say, that men having much more experience in the affairs of the State than either myself or himself, think just the reverse, and that the revenue system greatly needs correction and revision. All our late Governors have thought so, and I now hazard the prediction, that Governor Wright will again call the attention of the people of the State to this subject, and present startling facts, showing the utter inadequacy of the existing system to secure any equality as among the citizens and counties of the State. It is not to be disguised, that there is monstrous injustice and inequality in the present system. Vast amounts of property escape taxation, and thus a grievous burden is thrown upon those whose property is open and visible to all the world.

In regard to the Constitutional objection to taxing moneys invested in United States bonds, one of the first lawyers of the State, a few moments since, came around to my seat and assured me, there is nothing at all in the objection.

But, sir, I will withdraw the proposition which I made, and also the motion to re-commit, and move in lieu thereof the following: "to re-commit with instructions to introduce a section or sections requiring a uniform and equal assessment and taxation of all property, real and personal, in the State, excepting such as may by law be specifically exempted."

Mr. HOVEY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman of Monroe, in what particular the present law of the State does not provide for a uniform mode of taxation and assessment.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I would refer the gentleman to the opinion of Governor Wright, and—

Mr. HOVEY. I want the law.

Mr. BORDEN (interposing). With the permission of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) I will here state a fact in support of the truth of the assertion that there is not a uniform mode of taxation at present, in force, and that there is a great deal of the property that goes untaxed. I have been informed, from authentic sources, that the estate of one gentleman in Madison, which was taxed at some sixty thousand dollars during his life-time, recently at his decease, was appraised at its real cash value, and was valued at something like three hundred thousand dollars. I have heard also, of another instance in this State where an individual had been taxed only to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars, when the estate, upon his decease, was found to be really worth between four and five hundred thousand dollars. This difference, sir, is enormous, and shows how unjust has been the operation of the present system of taxation. I would state, in addition, that I was recently informed that the taxation of the property of this city, for city purposes, amounted to near one million dollars more than it did for State purposes. This has been the case also in the city of Madison, although not to so great an extent.

Mr. HOVEY. That was the fault of the officers of the law, and not of the law itself. And if the amendment now proposed is ingrafted in the Constitution, it will be liable to the same objection and want of execution that the present law is liable to.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to amend the instructions of the gentleman from Monroe, so that they should read "inquire into the expediency of."

The PRESIDENT ruled the motion out of order.

Mr. McFARLAND moved to amend the instructions by striking out the word "law," and inserting the words "this Constitution," in lieu thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I rise, sir, to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that they must send up their proposition now, as imperative restrictions, or they cannot be reported back. This committee has not the right to report them back. Amendments must be prepared containing the principles that gentlemen desire to have embodied in the sections reported back. The committee then has nothing to do but report the sections back containing those amendments proposed. This I think is the parliamentary law.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that instructions now adopted must be of an imperative character, and just as the Convention desires they shall be reported back. The Chair decides all other amendments out of order.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said, he had no doubt that the particular character of the section which the Convention should desire to have re-committed and reported back—should be determined upon now. He would merely remark, in this connection, that if every species of property was to be taxed in the State, the collection of the tax upon landed property, covered by the loans of the State, would cost the State more than it would receive for tax.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President, for certainly, if amendments are out of order, debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT stated that instructions of an imperative character were now in order.

Mr. WOLFE. I would inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move a reference to a select committee.

The PRESIDENT. It is in order with instructions.

Mr. WOLFE. As this is a matter in which the people of the entire State are interested, I move its reference to a select committee composed of one member from each Congressional district.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that at this stage of proceeding, a motion to refer must be accompanied by instructions. On a third reading of a section, it can only be referred with imperative instructions—and beyond these instructions the committee have no right to act.

Mr. BASCOM. I move to refer to a select committee with the instruction lying on the Clerk's table.

The PRESIDENT refused to entertain the motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to remark, sir, that these two sections reported here, should be adopted without any reference to the mode of taxation. The method of taxation is an entirely different subject from those embraced in these sections. If gentlemen will look at the old Constitution they will find that two provisions—similar to the present sections—are there incorporated without any reference to the method of taxation. The subject of taxation is a separate section, that has not yet been reported upon by any committee. I will, therefore, move to lay all the pending amendments on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled all amendments out of order, that were not to re-commit with peremptory instructions.

Mr. PRATHER. If it is in order to move to re-commit with instructions, I move to re-commit the second section with the following instructions:

The instructions were here sent to the Secretary's table, when

The PRESIDENT stated that as the entire article was under consideration, a motion to re-commit the entire article was only in order.

Mr. PRATHER. I move then to re-commit the entire article with the following instructions:

The instructions were here read by the Secretary, and provided that a correct statement of the receipts and expenditures of the public money, should be made annually under the direction and supervision of the Governor, and should be published with the laws, at each regular session of the General Assembly.

Mr. PRATHER remarked, that as the Convention had decided upon biennial sessions of the Legislature, it seemed to him proper and right that they should have an annual exhibit of the condition of the finances of the State.

The PRESIDENT. To which committee does the gentleman propose to refer.

Mr. PRATHER. To the committee on finance and taxation.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I think that these exhibits, sir, ought properly to come under the supervision of the Legislature. By this amendment it is proposed that they shall come under the supervision of the Governor. I think the Legislature ought to supervise them, and they can order them to be made annually if they choose.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would suggest to the gentleman who offered this amendment, that this exhibit will only be published with the laws of the Legislature once in two years, and therefore to take it annually will accomplish nothing. If the report was published annually it might accomplish something.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I think, sir, that this subject comes up more appropriately under another section—number twenty-two, reported by the committee on the executive department. If the present amendment is necessary at all, it will be in order when that section comes up for consideration. I think it is entirely foreign to the sections now under consideration.

Mr. RITCHEY. I concur entirely with the remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) that these sections now before us should be adopted, and that the method of taxation is a subject that should be separately acted upon. I, therefore, move the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention second the demand for the previous question.

The demand was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the main question now be put?

It was so ordered by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the first and second sections of article number eight now pass?

On this motion the yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 119, nays 3:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—119.

Those voting in the negative were,
Messrs. Chapman, Kinley, and Pettit—3.

So the first and second sections of number eight passed, and were referred to the committee on revision, arrangement and phraseology.

Mr. WATTS. Is it in order to amend by adding an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot amend the sections, for they are passed.

Mr. BASCOM, on leave, offered a resolution, that the committee on finance inquire into the expediency of subjecting the stock, and all other property of any banking institution that may be created in this State, to the same taxation as other property; which was adopted.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of report No. 11, being a report from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

PREAMBLE TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first on the preamble.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley suggested that it would be a great saving of time to pass a number of sections by one vote rather than to take the vote on each section separately.

The PRESIDENT. This is the only section that is on its third reading.

Mr. SMITH. Then I move to lay the section upon the table until we get through with the whole report.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "No, no, no, no," and "question, question."

The question was then taken on the adoption of the preamble, which is:

"We the people of Indiana, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to establish justice, maintain public order, and perpetuate liberty, do ordain this Constitution."

The yeas and nays being taken on the question, under the rule, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yochm, Zenor, and Mr. President—124.

NAY.—Mr. Pettit.

So the preamble was adopted.

On motion, the Convention then adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of report No. 11.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the first section, which is as follows:

"We declare that all power is inherent in the people; and that all free governments are, and of right ought to be founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, the people have at all times an inalienable right to alter and reform their government."

Mr. WATTS. I have an amendment which I wish to offer to that section. It is to add to it the following words:

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government, may be recognized and unalterably established: WE DECLARE, That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights; among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Mr. BORDEN. If gentlemen will turn to the first section of the first article of the existing Constitution, they will see that it is this section which it is proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, to insert in the bill of rights.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the Convention will not proceed to take the question on that amendment, until there is a call of the House. I do not hold to the truth of that doctrine, notwithstanding that it is found in the old Constitution, and therefore I move a call of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to and the roll was accordingly called.

Mr. READ moved to suspend the further call, which was agreed to.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) on the table.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "No, no, no," and "Vote, vote, vote."

Mr. CHAPMAN. Well, if gentlemen are disposed to vote upon the question, I will withdraw my motion. But I really must express my hope that we shall not have another negro discussion, considering that there is a committee of ten appointed to take this negro business altogether under their consideration, and report the result of their deliberations to the Convention. I cannot see that there is any utility in discussing these abstract propositions before we get a report from that committee. If gentlemen are disposed to say that any portion of the white inhabitants of the State shall not enjoy the same rights which are enjoyed by the other portion, why, then, there may be some necessity for modifying the section. If gentlemen desire to go into a discussion of the abstract question, I will not press my motion to lay the amendment on the table; but I did hope and desire that we should be relieved from another negro discussion during the same week; for I must say that I regard such discussions as neither calculated to promote the public good, nor as creditable to the State.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the gentleman will not persist in his motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CHAPMAN. If gentlemen wish to discuss the matter, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. PRESIDENT: I not only think that this or any other Constitution should be plain of understanding, with simple and direct words of meaning, but that it should contain declarations of truths, not only in theory, but in fact. Now, this first section of the old Constitution does not contain the truth in fact, and for that reason, I am opposed to its insertion in the new Constitution. The language is, "That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government, may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights," &c.

Now, however true this may be in theory, and however desirable that it should be true in fact, it is a falsehood in fact and is not true. This Convention, in a resolution which they have recently passed, recognizes the truth of what I have said. It is so recognized the world over, that it is not true in fact. We have just given our sanction to a law for capturing men—if men they are to be called—bipeds, I suppose some would call them, with two feet, and two hands, and two eyes, and other organs constituted like men—from other States. This language in the old Constitution is too broad, as is also that reported by the committee. It declares that "all free governments ought to be founded on the authority of the people," &c. Now, this language may do very well, if it is restricted to our own State. I would suggest that it should read "and that the government of this State is founded," &c. Sir, there is no propriety whatever in our declaring a principle that is to go beyond our territorial limits as a State.

Now that all men are born free and independent, is a direct and unequivocal lie in fact. The negro is not born "equally free and independent" in Kentucky, in Tennessee, or South Carolina, or in any of the slave-holding States. In the first place, it is bad language. It is a solecism to say that "all men" are "born" equally free. Why, sir, "men" are not "born" at all; there is no such thing as "born" with "men." [Laughter.] It is a lie in fact; it is a solecism in language; "babies" are born, sir, [great laughter,] not "men." Now, if they had used the term "persons," instead of "men," they would have been nearer the mark, although that might not suit the notions of some, inasmuch as "women" would then be included in the term. I am descanting on the section to show its absurdity in form as well as in substance. The language should have been "persons," and then it might have been good enough, although the assertion itself, would still have been false.

Sir, children may be "born equally free and independent;" but, as I have said, in the slave-holding States they are not born equally free and independent, nor indeed are the children of all white men.

Sir, I contend that, in framing an instrument of this kind, all the language that we employ in it, should apply to our own territorial limits, and to them only. We ought to confine ourselves to our own jurisdiction. The people in Ireland, or in England, or under the dominion of the Czar of Russia, that great polar power, are not born free and equal. There is no equality between the serf, though white he be, and the Emperor Nicholas, or between them and the free born citizens of Indiana, and therefore, any language which we may employ, should be confined to our own limits, where we have the power to secure that freedom and equality.

But, sir, a little more as to this freedom and equality. We have given our sanction—and I approve of what we have done, and I do not want to put a contradiction into the new Constitution—we have said that men may be arrested and taken to the State of Kentucky, or Louisiana, or Tennessee, on ex parte evidence, thereby clearly admitting that they were not born equally free and equal with ourselves. We allege, therefore, that which is not true in fact. The child of the slave in Kentucky is not free and equal, like the free-born child of the citizen of Indiana, and to employ such language, is to introduce an absurdity which we ought not to adopt.

Sir, I am advised and informed that this difficulty stared the committee in the face, and that they did not, therefore, report back this section, but have reported one which is tantamount to it in all other things, so far as the citizens of Indiana are concerned. As I have already remarked, the language ought to be so restricted as to apply to our own territorial limits, and then, if we were to say all white persons of the State of Indiana were born free and equal, we would be nearer the truth.

Now, I ask what gentleman—except it be that one who desires that the negro should occupy an entire political equality with himself—will, or can vote for this old section? Is there any truth in it? No man can say that they are not men; and I say, though he be free born in Indiana, the descendant of one of your free negroes—the man of color in this State—is not born with the same equality with which the white child is born, and I ask the Convention not to give a direct lie to their practice, in their declarations in the Constitution. I hope the section will be abandoned, as the committee were compelled to abandon it. At the time that this old Constitution was made, the language was used merely to speak of a political independence. At the time of the Declaration of Independence, and the formation of the Constitution of the United States, negroes were not regarded as men, in the Constitution at all. I know that in the Constitution of the United States, they were quasi men for the purposes of representation, but for that only. But since that time things have changed, and there are men now to be found, who contend that these men ought to form part and parcel of our political body.

Sir, if this section were to be adopted, we ought to strike out the word "men," and insert "all white persons in this State." That is the way in which it ought to read, if we would avoid showing our supercilious arrogance, by declaring a principle as applicable to the whole world, when we have no right to go beyond our own jurisdiction. Sir, the Emperor Nicholas, with his serfs, or Queen Victoria, with her subjects, would care very little about such a declaration, made in the State of Indiana. Sir, the most ultra abolitionist I ever came across, acknowledges that there is no equality between the negro and himself. He is not willing to put them upon an equality with himself, either socially or politically. It is true that the law may make them politically equal, but no law can ever make them socially equal. If they are to be politically equal, I would propose, too, that they should be socially equal, and then we will see what our abolitionist agitators will say to that.

I have said that all men were not and could not be socially equal; inasmuch as there is a diversity of tastes and tendencies, arising from education, as well as from prejudice, just so certainly will there be a difference in social equality, and they never can make it otherwise.

The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) the other day objected to what I said about social equality, and he seemed to think that all men were socially equal as well as politically equal, and that he had seen men of letters who had not five ideas above an oyster.

This may be true—and this might be the character of the man with whom he is best acquainted. But then, I ask, would such a man be a fit associate for the good hard sense and well informed farmer and mechanic? Or would either feel that they were the social equals of the learned divines of the country? Certainly not; for they could not talk about the same subjects with equal interest to each. Let the man who thinks there is a perfect social equality go and associate with chamber-maids or the gutter-wallowers. This he will not be willing to do.

So that you see there is no social equality. I do not pretend to say which is the most valuable member of society. You may take your kitchen girl who is constantly laboring over kettles and pans, and attending to household drudgery, and the ladies, or women, whichever you chose to call them, who are constantly poring over novels, or "literary pursuits," and compare them together. I will not give any opinion as to which is the most useful member of society, or whose social qualities are the best; but I do not recognize that they are not socially equal, nor can they be, although either of them may have very little more than "five ideas above an oyster." So much for "social equality."

Sir, I hold it to be always better to have no sort of ambiguity. I like the truth—the plain, open, honest truth; and no man need tell me that I have ruined myself with the democratic party by speaking the truth. Now, sir, you may go to the farmer who earns his living by his labor in the fields; and ask him if the gutter-wallower is on a social equality with him; if he would allow him to come to his fire-side and be socially equal with his family, and he will tell you indignantly, "No sir." Ask him again if he were placed among a body of learned men, either of the clergy or the laity, who were discussing matters of philosophy or literature, whether he would feel himself on a social equality with them, and he would give you the same emphatic answer, "no, sir; I would not be happy in their society any more than a fiend would in heaven, or an angel in hell." Society in such case is reversed. In order to be socially equal, you must have the same tendencies and appetites, and tastes, and sympathies, let the parties have more or less ideas.

Now, I say that we all admit that in this State there is neither a political nor a social equality between the negro and the white man. He cannot vote at your elections; he cannot sit on juries in your courts. No man desires that he should. Even the most violent abolitionist would not desire to sit on a jury with him or to go to the ballot-box with him; and hence he denies that there is a political equality; and how much more does he deny the social equality? Sir, there can be no social equality where there is no intermarrying. If a man tells me that the negro is on a social equality with him why then let the negro marry his sister. If a man tells me that having a son, and that there being a young negro of his own age in the neighborhood, he allows him to be on the same footing with his son in all respects, why then, sir, he will tell me that the young negro may marry his daughter. Sir, it is evident, beyond a question, that there is neither political, nor social equality, and we ought not, therefore, to adopt this section with this glaring truth staring us in the face. Let us then contrast our declarations. Even that part of the section which talks about "all free governments," is too broad, in my opinion, and ought to be confined to the governments of the State. I hope that the section will be dropped or abandoned, and if not that it may be so modified as to read "all white persons in this State are born free and equal, and have certain rights," &c. With such a modification, I think the section would not be objectionable. But I think we ought to make a Constitution with plain declarations of truth not only in theory, not only as they ought to be, but as they are in fact; and there is no man in this State, who does not know that there is no equality between the white and the black races, even where slavery is not known.

Mr. RARIDEN. To that part of the gentleman's speech, the object of which was to restore himself to his correct position with his party and his country, I have nothing to say. It was right that he should do so; and I should be happy to see him restored to the confidence of those whom he has heretofore so faithfully served, and so gloriously led. But, with regard to this section, I have something to say. I do not want it slain in this House upon a false apprehension of its true history, and true meaning, and its true character. I call the gentleman back to its true origin. The sentiment of the section is to be found in the Declaration of Independence, when our fathers met to form a government, and when the forms and theories of every government in the civilized world were before them. They comprehended the theories of all other governments; but this government, the one which they established, had not a parallel on the face of the earth. All governments were based upon the theory that all power was vested in the king; and that the subject had no power except as his majesty thought proper to grant to him. That was the foundation of every government on the face of the earth, that existed as an organized government at that time. Now, what said our fathers at the time they put forth these glorious ideas to the world? "A decent respect for the opinions of mankind, induces us to put forth the principles on which we are about to found our government. It is not the theory that 'all power is in the King.' No. A decent respect for the opinions of the world, makes it our duty that we should tell mankind that we have changed the whole theory of civil government. We start out upon the theory, that all power is in the people; that the people have capacity for self-government—that they have innate rights, and there is a natural equality of rights," &c.

Now, let me say another word as to what is meant by "the people." It is the people whose rights were attacked—the people who felt themselves trodden under foot by the tyrannical power of Great Britain. That was "the people" who looked upon Great Britain as their head, and who called her the "mother country." These are the people who declared that all men are born free and equal, and have certain natural and inalienable rights—they spoke for themselves and for those upon which theory was to act, and no other "people" were recognized, according to my understanding of the matter, than such as had political rights in the great struggle.

Then, sir, I am for keeping up that declaration. Whether it be practically true or theoretically true, it is that which our fathers thought was necessary, out of respect for the opinions of the world, to put forth in the formation of a new government, as its model basis. [Applause.] And, sir, I want it perpetuated as long as time shall last. [Applause.] I want no changes in it, and I want practice to come as near to theory as possible. I am not going to discuss it metaphysically, whether it is theoretically true or practically true; it is the great basis—the great principle on which our fathers assumed to act in the organization of the government which they gave to the world, and which has not a parallel in the annals of history. Then I am for clinging to it. I glory in it. I see our fathers' faces in it when I look at it, and when I contemplate the circumstances under which that declaration was made. They were not sitting, as we are sitting, in peace and quiet, apprehending no danger except the danger which may arise from our own unruly passions. A power was raised against them, strong enough to almost cause the world to tremble, but they spoke out.

The magnitude of the occasion which brought them together—the respect which they showed for the opinions of mankind, gives to that declaration, in my mind, a moral grandeur and a value beyond price, and with which I will not willingly part. ["Hear, hear."] The sentiment is to be found in the Declaration of Independence, and it is expressed there just for the reason which I have assigned. They were about to establish a government on a new theory, unknown to kingly and other governments of the old world. And for that reason I want to commemorate it, and to hand it down to the latest posterity, just in the same shape which they gave it, and in the same spirit which they infused into it. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I desire to say a few words to the Convention, and gentlemen need be under no apprehension that I am going to deliver a harangue on the "negro question." I took no part in the protracted discussion of that question when it was before the Convention, and do not expect that I shall, when, in the order of business, it again comes up for our consideration. I would advocate the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) if there was not a negro in the State or the Union. It appears to me that a sort of negro-phobia has seized upon the majority of this Convention, and that they are ready with a "mad dog" cry to pursue any proposition that may be even remotely connected with the welfare of that unfortunate race. It might be well for us to take heed lest in our zeal to banish the negroes from the State, we fail to provide the ordinary and necessary guaranties for the protection of the white inhabitants of Indiana.

The first section of the bill of rights in our present Constitution, which it is now proposed to insert, appears to have been most carefully avoided by our committee on rights and privileges. That section declares "that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights, among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Among the inalienable rights here enumerated is that "of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property." It appears to be thought necessary to deprive the negroes of this right in order to banish them from the State, and that I suppose is the reason why our committee on rights and privileges has not reported the section. But, sir, is it necessary for the disfranchisement of the African race that we should put at peril our own dearest interests? This indirect mode of accomplishing an object may be found to work so well in practice as to become a little too popular. It will put it in the power of a majority to banish an odious minority from the State, not indeed by a direct decree, but indirectly, by depriving them of the right "of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property."

Only a few days since, a member of this Convention denounced the negroes as "vermin," and the abolitionists as worse than the negroes. He is very anxious to drive the "vermin" from the State, and why, then, should he not be in favor of banishing that class of persons whom he considers worse than vermin? No doubt so desirable an object might be attained by depriving the abolitionists of the right of acquiring property. Any class of persons obnoxious to the majority may, by this summary process, be banished from the State. Sir, I understand the very object of a Constitution is to protect the minority in the enjoyment of their rights—to put a restraint upon the hot blood and the strong arm of the majority. And unless this restraint is employed in this very case, you leave unrestricted a power which history proves is peculiarly liable to abuse.

In our mother country the confiscation of property was long a favorite mode of punishing political offenses and religious heresies. It was doubly agreeable to those in power, because, while it punished the offenders it enriched those who enforced the law. If a favorite courtier needed an estate, the readiest way of obtaining it was to select one suited to his tastes, charge the owner with heresy, and cause the estate to be confiscated and bestowed upon himself. Half the wars that ever distracted that kingdom had their origin in the robberies growing out of this system of confiscating property.

It is not a very difficult matter even in republic to excite strong prejudices against certain classes of persons. We often hear it asserted that certain religious doctrines and organizations are inimical and dangerous to our institutions. Circumstances may occur to greatly strengthen such impressions, and under the influence of strong prejudices or extraordinary excitements this potent remedy retained for the benefit of the black, may be applied to the disfranchisement of some portion of our white population. This right of acquiring and possessing property is secured either expressly or by implication in the Constitution of almost every State in the Union, a few of them, indeed, limiting its enjoyment to white persons; and the necessity must be a very imperious one that will justify us in failing to give it an express recognition in our Constitution.

The first part of this section expresses that sentiment which occupies so prominent a place in our Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." To this sentiment I cling with that fondness of affection which has been so beautifully expressed by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden). It has revolutionary associations. It was made by the fathers of the republic, and comes down to us hallowed by the memory of their long and arduous struggles to maintain it. In the "unanimous declaration of the thirteen United States of America," we find the first authoritative enunciation ever made of the great principle that all men are created free and equal. The oppressed of every nation received the announcement with joy and hope. They have repeated it from one to another until it has become the watch-word of liberty throughout the world. [Great applause.] Wherever there is now a man struggling for liberty, his heart swells with emotion as he repeats this sentiment, and turns his eyes to the Republic of the west as affording the world an example of freedom and equality—of a government instituted and sustained by the consent of the governed. Under the influence of this principle thrones have crumbled to the dust, and despots have been compelled to relax the bonds of their subjects. It has not yet fulfilled its destiny, nor will it until universal liberty prevails throughout the earth. And shall we now discard this principle which our fathers proclaimed defiantly in the face of the most powerful nation on the globe, and for the support of which they cheerfully endured all the privations and calamities of a protracted war? Shall we strike it in disgrace from our bill of rights? [Cries of "no, no."] I trust not, sir. Let us give to this sentiment the first place in our bill of rights, that our children and our children's children may early learn it, and cherish it in their hearts as one of the fundamental principles of our government.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) says very truly, that the existence of slavery in our country is inconsistent with this declaration, and that our practices give the lie to all our professions on the subject of freedom and equality. Our fathers felt this inconsistency, but they boldly proclaimed what they believed to be the true principle of government, trusting that in time slavery would cease to exist, and with it this gross inconsistency. The history of those times and the debates in the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, show that the men of the Revolution looked upon slavery as a temporary institution—one that circumstances beyond our control had established among us—but one that must fall before the advancing progress of Christianity and philanthropy. Let us cherish the same hopes, and let us not accommodate the declaration of our principles to the existence of slavery, but let us rather earnestly labor in every way we properly can, for the removal of the inconsistency that stares us in the face, by the removal of slavery itself.

Mr. BORDEN. It occurs to me that the objection that has been made, that the committee has not reported back the section as it is in the old Constitution, is not a good one. I think it is most likely that they left it out because the subject has now been referred to another committee. It occurs to me that we might pass the section as it stands in the old Constitution; and then it would be in the power of the committee on phraseology to change it if any change should be deemed necessary. For my part, I am willing to vote for the section as it stands in the old Constitution. I do not wish to go into any discussion on the subject, for it is clearly one which cannot bear much discussion. Our views and principles of freedom are well understood in this country, and I think there is too much danger to be apprehended from the causes suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn). I cannot, however, take my seat without saying that I feel under great obligations to that gentleman for the speech he has just made, considering the section of the State from which he comes; and if he never should make another speech in this Convention, the one that he has made here to-day will always stand forth as a justification both of his head and his heart.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "declare," and inserting the words "of the original Declaration of Independence in regard to this matter."

[The words as proposed to be substituted were read by the Secretary.]

That, said Mr. S., is an exact copy of part of the Declaration of Independence, and I prefer it to any other section that can be framed.

Mr. WATTS. I will accept the modification of the gentleman from Putnam.

Mr. OWEN. As chairman of the committee on rights and privileges, it becomes my duty to state to the Convention what were the circumstances under which this section was not reported. The gentleman from Jefferson has employed the words "stricken disgracefully out of the organic law of our State." Now, in the first place, all that the committee intended to do—all that they have done—was to refrain, for the present, from reporting that section. I presume that the gentleman from Jefferson was not in his seat when I made this explanation a few days since.

But why did they refrain from reporting that section? In the first place, for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) that there was another subject—the subject of the exclusion of negroes from this State, and the question of their holding real estate therein—which had not been acted upon by the Convention, and with regard to which it was impossible that the committee could know what the action of the Convention would be.

How reads the section in question? Among the "inalienable rights of all men"—black and white—there is no distinction—"is the right of" acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. Now, sir, it is quite clear, that if we prevent negroes, under any circumstances, from coming into this State, or from holding real estate, we have no right to put such a declaration as this into our Constitution; until that matter is decided one way or the other, common consistency requires that we should refrain from reporting the section. I remark, however, that we expressly refrained, also, from asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the first article, reserving to ourselves the right to report, at any time, in such form, as, under all the circumstances might seem best.

I will say for myself, that there was another subject—I do not know that it had influence with other members of the Convention, but it had great weight with me—that in regard to the property of married women, which, as it has not, at the time of the report, been acted upon, seemed to me to require that we should postpone the reporting of this section. When we employ, in a Constitution, the words “all men,” we use the term “men” in a general sense. We include both sexes. As, for example, when we say: “All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.” This, of course, guaranties liberty of conscience to women, as well as to men. So when we say: “All men have an inalienable right to enjoy, possess, and protect property,” the declaration extends to women as well as to men. Now, unless we change the old principle of the common law, which merges, in the husband, the legal existence of the wife, women, during the entire period of their married life—and that is their usual condition—have no more active or available rights, to acquire, or to enjoy, or to protect property, than the negro slave has. Unless, therefore, we change that principle, we have no right to insert in our Constitution any such declaration as that contained in the section under consideration. As to one-half of the white citizens of this State, that declaration is an absolute falsehood.

I differ with my friend from Allen (Mr. Borden) as to the remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn). I do not think that the gentleman has spoken with his usual perspicuity. He asks us “Where in this new Constitution, is the right of the citizen asserted to life, to liberty, and to property? Are we to have no security for these rights? Is it all to be done away?” Would the gentleman have us believe that the security of rights invaluable as these hangs upon a few words recorded in the instrument we are now engaged in framing? Is it not elsewhere, and otherwise, secured to us? The gentleman spoke of the Declaration of Independence. To whom does that noble document belong? Technically, it is the “declaration of the thirteen United States of America.” But is it not ours as much as theirs? Are not we, a younger State, indeed, and coming somewhat later into the Confederacy—are not we as much participants in the rights therein guarantied, as the original thirteen States? Is not that one Declaration, traced by the pen of the immortal Jefferson, all-sufficient? Must we and every other State repeat it before we are entitled to its guaranties? Did they re-write it in the Constitution of the United States, when that instrument was framed? And because they did not, will the gentleman from Jefferson argue, that, as citizens of the Union, these rights are not guarantied to us at all? That, surely, is not a logical inference.

Sir, there were some suggestions made in committee to modify this section. There was some talk about inserting the word “white,” so as to give it a limited application, and avoid the difficulty alluded to by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). I can say for myself—and I believe I may speak for the rest of the committee if they speak not for themselves—that we preferred to report it just as it stood, or not at all. We were confirmed in that opinion by the fact, that in the Constitutions of several of the States it is wholly omitted. Here, for example, is the New York Constitution, only about four years old, in which this section or anything corresponding to it is not to be found. Will the gentleman from Jefferson thence infer, that the citizens of that great State are not guarantied in the right to acquire, to possess, to protect property? His argument leads inevitably to such a conclusion.

Even in some of the other Constitutions there are similar omissions. I turn to the Constitution of Connecticut—a State for which I have a warm feeling, for I found my wife there—and I perceive that in the bill of rights there is not a word about the right of acquiring, enjoying, and protecting property. Here is the only corresponding clause: “All men, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights; and no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive public emoluments, or privileges from the community.” Again I turn to the gentleman from Jefferson, and ask him whether he holds that the citizens of Connecticut also, are without security as to the right of acquiring and protecting property? That argument will not do, sir. The gentleman himself, must, I think, perceive its fallacy.

So far as the committee is concerned, I believe I may say that we have no feeling in regard to this matter. We passed the section over, after a brief conversation, in which we concluded that it was best to postpone it for the present; and I here protest against any inference being drawn from its not appearing here, except simply this, that we were not at the time prepared to report it in the words of the old Constitution.

Mr. HOWE. I am not particular whether the section in the original Constitution is retained or not, but I protest against the arguments which have been introduced here to induce us to dispense with it. As I have remarked before in this body, and as every gentleman is aware, even a good cause may be injured by a bad argument; and whether this section is to remain or not, is a question to be discussed and determined by rational men upon very different grounds, and for very different reasons from any that I have yet heard.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) contended that the proposition that all men are born equally free and independent is not true. In the sense in which he uses the words, he is undoubtedly correct; but with his intellect certainly he ought to have been able to approximate to the meaning which existed in the mind of the immortal author of these words when he first committed them to paper. In the sense of Jefferson and the framers of the Declaration of Independence, the assertion is true, and always will be true. The assertion refers to the rights of man as existing under the law of nature; and by that law, in contra-distinction to the law of man, all men are born equally free. That is the way in which the term "men" is used.

It does not require a grammarian to know that men are not "born" in the sense in which the gentleman from Tippecanoe used the term. All know that this "man" is a generic term, including the whole human race, and refers undoubtedly to the time of their birth. It simply declares that all men are born free, and that by the law of man, and usurpation alone, they have become enslaved. That is the meaning precisely, and nothing more nor less. The objection that slavery now exists has nothing whatever to do with the matter. Now we all know—for we have all both heard and read—what is the origin of slavery. Is slavery legitimate by the law of nature or of man? Can you hold slaves by the law of nature? Every school-boy will respond "no" to the question, and tell you that it exists only by usurpation. The words, therefore, are not only true, but beautifully true; and as an abstract proposition it is eminently just. As I said before, I care very little whether it is retained in the new Constitution or not. It will be equally true whether we adopt it or reject it. But inasmuch as our ancestors have seen proper to adopt these words, and inasmuch as they were in the mouth of every freeman of the country at the time, and have become nationalized, and immortalized by the circumstances under which they were written, I think we ought to retain them. There certainly can be no impropriety in doing so; but, on the contrary, I regard them as manifestly proper. If there be one political document that has been given to immortality more than another, it is precisely that Declaration. Nothing whatever in all Grecian or Roman times can possibly excel this in classic purity or excellence. Let us then adopt it.

And let me now refer for a moment to an argument used by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) that these words conflict with the section in regard to the rights of women.

Now we are not going to determine by this article what the laws of nature are. I have said that by the laws of nature all men are equally free and independent; that by the laws of nature every one, whether man or woman, is entitled to the first fruits of his industry and his possessions. By the law of nature the savage who first builds and occupies a hut is entitled to it; but when he enters into society he must conform to the rules and regulations which that society may adopt; and the mere fact that by marrying a woman her property is thereby transferred to her husband, is nothing more nor less than transferring the property as it were by deed. She is not compelled to marry. It is usually with her a matter of choice. It is a contract like all other contracts so far as property is concerned; and when she marries she transfers her property to her husband by the law of the land. But what, let me ask, has this to do with the laws of nature. I may as well say that whether these words are good or not, whether they are right or not, no argument which I have heard against them has shown to me their impropriety; but, on the contrary, the very absurdity of the arguments made use of shows to me their truth and excellence.

If it be in order at this stage, I will move an amendment to the first section under consideration; it is to add at the end of the section these words: "in accordance with their Constitution." That clause of the section will then read—

"For the advancement of these ends the people have at all times an inalienable right to alter and reform their government in accordance with their Constitution."

I will make one or two remarks in relation to the propriety of the amendment, although I do not feel like discussing the subject at the length which its importance demands. It is really a question which is at the foundation of all free governments. It is a question on which the mutability or immutability of true popular sovereignty in this country as it really ought to be considered is based. I am aware that there are, perhaps, very few in the Convention will agree with me in what I am about to say in support of the amendment; but notwithstanding that, I have offered it under a sense of duty and propriety, and even if I knew that not a single member would sustain me, I should still feel it my duty to offer it.

My proposition is, that these words as they stand—"that the people have a right at all times to alter and reform their government"—are not true. If you adopt these words without any limitation, and carry them out to their legitimate consequences, it will lead to anarchy and confusion; and it is precisely that doctrine on which all the modern notions, which have produced so much anarchy in Europe, have been based. It is precisely that dogma which has been so zealously preached that a mere popular majority may set themselves up as arbiters and alter the law of the land at their own will. This dogma is not true. Undoubtedly, both in theory and in fact, the right to govern is based on the will of the people. No man will doubt that, for it is not merely an abstract proposition, but one which is manifestly true in fact. At the same time we all know that the exercise of authority by the whole people in their collective capacity is practically impossible. Still they have the sovereignty; but being incapable of exercising it themselves in person, they have a right to exercise it in the only way in which it can be exercised—by a delegation of it to others. That is the foundation of republican institutions in this country. A delegation of sovereignty is not a restriction, but an absolute delegation of power. There may be, and undoubtedly is, in every Constitution, in one sense or another, a reservation of the exercise of sovereignty for the same particular purpose. The people may reserve a part of their sovereignty, but they do not restrict it; for if you assume the idea that a Constitution is merely a restriction of the popular sovereignty, what is the inference? That the people retain the sovereignty and all the powers of government; the exercise of which is merely restricted, and that all their power remains—which is manifestly untrue—and that at any moment they can remove these restrictions and exercise all their sovereignty again. This idea is founded in the false analogy of the ancient democracies of Greece, where all the members of the democracy met together and performed the functions of government, which in this country is impossible. Therefore there must be a delegation of power to the different branches of government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial—and the people delegate that power to these functionaries as they shall from time to time, under that Constitution, come into existence. In every point of view it is not a restriction upon the popular sovereignty, but it is a delegation of power to all intents and purposes whatever. True, our Constitution and the Constitutions of many other States preserve the power of altering and amending the organic law. There is no doubt about the propriety of this. This is not a restriction of the popular sovereignty, but a reservation. There is a vast difference between a restriction and a reservation of power, and this is a reservation and nothing more nor less. A Constitution then like our's contains a delegation of power to the different departments—the legislative, the executive and the judicial—and it contains a reservation that the people may recall or revoke that delegated power and amend or alter it from time to time. That is the true theory of government in this country, and any other theory will lead to endless anarchy and confusion.

Besides, government in this country is founded on the idea that it is created not for the benefit of the majority, but for the benefit of all. In whom is the popular sovereignty placed in this country. Practically it is placed in the majority. It is by the majority that the Constitution is adopted. It is by the majority in all our assemblies that the government is carried on. But who are the subjects? for wherever there is a sovereignty there must be a subject. Every individual in the land is a subject, but more especially the minority. In every country there is a sovereign power; the sovereignty is supposed to reside somewhere; and in this country it implicitly and in fact exists in the majority of the people. Now is it not manifestly true that the sovereign power, whatever it be, may at all times limit and restrain itself—that it may part with some of its power? Clearly it is. This is the foundation of all the steps which liberty has taken to arrive at its present position in theory. Were it not for the truth of that theory England would never have arrived at its present position of power. The sovereign power, then, may restrict itself, and it may restrict itself irrevocably if it pleases. I hold that the people may delegate their power without retaining the privilege of recalling it if they please to do so. They have a right to say that they will delegate their sovereignty for five years, or ten years, or twenty years, or forever; and unless you adopt that theory you at once remove all guards and restrictions for the protection of liberty.

I shall not enter now into any further argument upon this question, for I suppose the Convention will not agree with me, and therefore I shall say no more on the subject at present. I have merely said this much with the view of placing myself in a right position in having offered the amendment, and for these reasons I have submitted it to the Convention.

Mr. FOSTER. I presume that the object of the committee who made this report was to endeavor to epitomize the two sections of the old Constitution, and to blend them into one. They have reported, but in doing so it appears to me that they have left out some points that should have been inserted in that article. I do not cast any reflection on that committee or on its Chairman; but, sir, even in the very preamble they did not think it necessary to acknowledge even a superintending Providence or an overruling Power. That part has been amended, but perhaps we may see from circumstances, the way the straws go, how the thing took place. I have no particular objection to the phraseology of the article; but it appears to me that it is not sufficient. I prefer the phraseology of the two sections of the old Constitution, and I hope they will be adopted.

I do not purpose entering on the present occasion into any philosophical discussion in regard to the rights of man, but merely to give my views, and to make some remarks in relation to the observations which fell from the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit).

It appears that the other day I was unfortunate in making this remark: "that there were some men of letters who had not five ideas above an oyster." The gentleman from Tippecanoe has adverted to that remark, and has played a tune upon it with all the variations from the highest to the lowest note; from the five keyed bugle down to the penny whistle. [Laughter.] Now were it worth the pains to prove it, I think I could very easily establish that proposition, and perhaps I should not have occasion to travel very far to find suitable examples. [Laughter.] It will perhaps be recollected that at the time I made the observation, that I made it with a reservation or qualification, which was, that if a man of letters did not mix with the world and become acquainted with mechanics and farmers and professional men and traders, he was incapable of duly appreciating things as they occurred, and that many of them, shut up in their closet from month to month, and from year to year, could scarcely have five ideas above an oyster in relation to the business of the world around them.

I am happy that the gentleman has modified the remark which he made the other day. He has entered into a labored explanation to elucidate his views; but, sir, he did say the other day, and he said it without any qualification whatever, "that there could be no social equality between the laboring man and the man of letters." I took it down at the time. Now had he said that there could be no social equality between the drunken man and the sober man—between the blockhead and the gentleman—I could have coincided with him. But when he said there could not be any social equality between the laboring man and the man of letters, I dissented from his proposition at once as being both anti-republican and anti-democratic. I said I could point to men upon this floor, far superior to many so-called men of letters, who were acquainted with the views and wishes of the people in the every day concerns of life, and were more adapted to carry them out, than many professing to possess great literary attainments. I did say that I knew some men of letters, who had gone through college and had got their degree duly certified on a piece of sheep-skin, who had not five ideas above an oyster. Now, sir, of the two, who are the most useful men? Why, sir, the laboring man; whether he labors in the pulpit or at the bar, or at the plough, or at the anvil, or anywhere else. Sir, such men as Elihu Burrett, the learned blacksmith, are far superior in every respect to your sickly students who waste their lives in the closet. Go into Congress and you will find men there—self taught men—who are far superior to many of the dolts who emerge from your colleges. Sir, Henry Clay never received a college education, and he has not his superior in any or every respect in that body, or perhaps in the United States. But I will not pursue this matter further. I merely wished to dissent from the proposition set forth by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and to protest against the position he assumed. I have the pleasure of being acquainted with many men of letters in the various professions, and who are useful members of society—men too who have never had a college education, but are self taught, and they will bear comparison with any men the gentleman from Tippecanoe may select, whom he may be pleased to designate as men of letters. The position I assumed was, that the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, was anti-republican; and I am glad that he has so far coincided with me as he has shown by his labored effort to set aside the force of the remark he made on last Saturday.

It was well remarked by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) in opposition to the views set forth by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, in regard to all men being created free and equal, that this was an assertion of principle in opposition to the doctrine of the "divine right of kings," that all power was derived from the throne; and that our fathers asserted that all power was inherent in the people, and that all power should be derived from them. That is the sum and substance of the whole affair. The time was when Louis XIV of France declared "I am the State;" but such a doctrine would not go down with the people in many parts of Europe now-a-days, much less in this country.

The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) has been pleased to allude to a remark which I made some days ago, in regard to terming negroes and abolitionists "vermin." When I first made the remark I qualified it. I observed that I had been in the Island of San Domingo, where they had been free for more than sixty years; and that I had seen them in Philadelphia; and that from what I had seen of them, they might justly be termed vermin. Some other gentleman put in a word and remarked that there was another species of bipeds, who might also with the same propriety be classed under that category—the abolitionists. Now I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider any people vermin, who encourage incendiarism, and endeavor to destroy their own government, and do every thing in their power to create dissension. I say they are vermin, and worse than vermin.

Sir, I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to show the qualified sense in which I used these words, and to congratulate the gentleman from Tippecanoe on the fact that he appears to have come to his senses, with regard to the unfortunate expression which he made use of the other day.

Mr. FARROW. I wish to say a word in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lagrange, which proposes to add to the section these words, "according to their Constitution." The section would then read as follows:

"That all power is inherent in the people, and all free Governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, they have, at all times, an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter or reform their Government in such manner as they may think proper, according to their Constitution."

It will be observed that in the preceding section it is proposed to establishing a Government, and as all Governments are founded on and consist of power, that power in a free Government is declared to be in the people, and that the design of its exercise in the formation of a Government is to secure peace, safety, and happiness. These objects being accomplished, the end for which the Government was formed is fully realized. The question arises, have the people a right under such a declaration, to call a Convention to alter a Constitution that seems to them everything contemplated by the Government, formed by the power of the people? If the framers of our present Constitution believed that this power might be exercised at all times, what interpretation do you suppose they would give to the eighth article of that instrument? Certainly, sir, they intended to prescribe a mode how, and a time when the people should exercise the power that is inherent in them, to alter or amend their Constitution. This, sir, is the sense in which the people of Indiana viewed the eighth article of our Constitution during the two first terms of twelve years that it passed, never pretending to meddle with it only at the time provided for in the Constitution. But, sir, during the last period of twelve years, the discovery has been made that because it is declared in the section proposed to be amended, that all power is inherent in the people, that therefore they have the right to alter or reform their Government in such manner as they may think proper, regardless of any Constitutional provision whatever. Now, sir, it is under this new interpretation of the Constitution that we are here sitting in Convention two years before the time fixed by the former Convention, for calling on the people to vote whether they would call a Convention or not. Sir, if we refuse to adopt this amendment, what assurance do you propose to the people that they shall not be annoyed from year to year by calling upon them to vote for a call of a Convention to make some alteration in their Constitution, for it is not to be denied that we have now, and I fear we shall continue to have those amongst us that will be ready at all times to urge upon the people that they would be greatly benefited by making further amendments to the Constitution, and that there is no restraint upon their power to do so whenever it may suit the purposes of politicians to enact a law requiring it of them.

Mr. President, this Convention is more the creature of politicians than of the people, for notwithstanding the people voted to call a Convention, I presume it will not be denied that politicians worked the wires for them. And now, sir, although it is unusual for one generation of men to hold more than one Convention, and I feel satisfied that the time and money that we shall expend, will deter the present generation from calling one, nevertheless I wish to see some provisions adopted that will render it unnecessary for our successors to use this power without doing so according to their Constitution.

Mr. KINLEY. Mr. PRESIDENT, I have hitherto refrained from speaking of matters personal to myself, thinking it wiser that charges and personal assaults go unanswered, than that the time of a hundred and fifty men, assembled for the solemn purpose of making a Constitution, should be taken up with a mere personal explanation. I thought also that charges, without a shadow of truth in them, are unworthy of refutation. But reflecting that these charges go to the record, and that my silence might be construed into an admission of their truth, I have determined for once to explain. It is due to myself as well as to those to whom I am indebted for the place I occupy on this floor to set myself right on the record.

An abolitionist has been represented as a species of non-descript animal, with but one idea, and that the overthrow of all government, human and divine. With this amiable definition the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) has been pleased to taunt me with the epithet of abolitionist. The opinions and actions of that party are matters of history, and it may be impossible for even the gentleman from Monroe to reverse the record, or to make the tenets of its political faith any other than what its rightful exponents have themselves avowed. They have a right to be the keepers of their own consciences, the exponents of their own faith. But if they should need the talents of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) I hope they will not be slow in informing the gentleman of the fact, and that his excessive modesty may not constrain him to withhold the desired assistance. But, sir, with their own definition of their principles, I never have been a member of their party or an advocate of their policy. Slavery I have always regarded as a State institution, existing by authority of State laws, and over it in the States Congress has no control. The abolition party, of whose principles Garrison is a distinguished exponent, holds the contrary of all this. So if I have not been an abolitionist in practice neither have I in theory.

I will say further, Mr. President, that I believe the Constitution of the United States makes some compromises in favor of slavery. I recognize, also, the acts of Congress as the supreme law of the land, and have never counseled forcible resistance to their execution. If I am in favor of resistance to the fugitive slave law, it is that kind of resistance which is consistent with the duties of an American citizen. I would test the constitutionality of the law before the proper judicial tribunal—I would urge its repeal. Though I would not be a member of the Union party existing in the heated imaginations of some gentlemen, yet I am for law and order—I am for the Union. I would not do, even for a just and humane purpose, what the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) avows himself ready to do for an unjust and evil one—join in insurrection against the law of the land. And I must be permitted to say, the resolutions of yesterday to the contrary notwithstanding, that I have never heard any but the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) avow a different sentiment. Whatever conceptions gentlemen may have of abolitionism, I declare that I would rather advocate the most ultra principles of that party I ever heard avowed, than to assert here in my place, and send the declaration down to all coming time, as did the gentleman from Monroe, my willingness to violate the great principles for which Constitutions are established and laws are enacted. The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) says that negroes are "vermin" and abolitionists are worse than vermin," and in his own inimitable style declares himself ready to assist to "tar and feather" them! Yet he is for the Union.

The gentleman in his place denies it. If in the face of his pointed speech and in opposition to the recollection of every gentleman on this floor, he chooses to deny his former avowal, he certainly is at liberty to do so. I thought at the time that the gentleman possessed more natural goodness than he gave himself credit for, and that in the heat of debate, he said what in his cooler moments he would be glad to retract.

MR. FOSTER. Will the gentleman pardon me. The speech was not altogether correct; but I will tell you what I did say. I said that when a foreign incendiary, such as Geo. Thompson, an Englishman, came here to talk about freedom, and left his own country, where the peasantry of England and Ireland are subjected to the veriest thralldom—I did not say that I would do it, but I said that I would freely see such an incendiary as he, tarred and feathered, so as to drive him away; and I repeat it here now.

MR. KINLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to hold the gentleman to his original declaration. I wish, indeed, he has explained away rather than repeat in substance, his former avowal. True, he does not say, as in his former speech, that he, himself, would assist, but that he would "freely see," violence done to the freedom of a freeman, in the exercise of a Constitutional privilege. The gentleman denounces the English agitators of American slavery, because they cannot see suffering at home. He places himself in a similar situation. He also condemns evil abroad, and declares himself ready to inflict it at home.

When a distinguished statesman of a sister State had declared that the law of God is higher than human laws, he was denounced as a traitor to the Constitution. But here, in the Constitutional Convention, mob-violence is declared to be above the law of the land, and the author of the unblushing avowal would "freely see" its execution?

I hope to be excused for having paid so much attention to the gentleman from Monroe. It is an offense of which I shall not again be guilty. I will leave the gentleman to himself. Let him have not only the praises of his contemporaries—let him enjoy, in anticipation, the plaudits of the people of all coming time, for the willingness which he manifests to trample under foot the principles to which they, too, will be indebted for whatever of freedom they may enjoy.

While I have the floor, I will say a few words in reference to the subject immediately under consideration.

Gentlemen object to having the natural equality of man declared in the bill of rights, because

1st. It is not true.

2d. It is true only in the abstract.

If the doctrine of the natural equality of man is a "lie," as is so vehemently declared by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) it has been the most glorious "lie" upon record. No political truth has ever accomplished so much for the well-being of man. With this "lie" inscribed upon their banners, with this "lie" impressed upon their hearts, our forefathers achieved the victory of liberty over tyranny. And this "lie," as gentlemen are pleased to call it, is the rock on which the fabric of our Government rests. But it did not stop here. The nations abroad caught the idea and rang the "lie" from nation to nation, from heart to heart, till the Christian statesman, Lamartine, big with the idea of "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," proclaimed France a republic!

But now it is discovered that we have held out false lights to the nations; that they have followed a mirage that will lead them to their ruin!

If the assertion of this "lie" has accomplished so much for the happiness of man, it may accomplish more; its mission of goodness may not yet be ended. I wish to see it on the record.

But it is an abstraction. Sir, all first principles are abstractions. Christianity is founded upon an abstraction. Government, law, science are all based upon abstractions. And this glorious abstraction to which the world is indebted for so much of all that civilizes and happyifies man, this one idea where centres and radiates all our conceptions of human liberty, should occupy a prominent place in the Constitution of a free people. "But it is not true in practice." The principles of Christianity and of abstract justice are often violated, but does this circumstance derogate from the principles of the gospel, or deny the power of justice? Will gentlemen argue that because government does not carry out the whole idea of the natural equality of man before the law, therefore, the principle is unsound? "Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," is an injunction, which requires a degree of purity to which few people ever attain. Suppose some ecclesiastical synod, had, on this account, expunged it from the gospel! Sir, if they could have found no precedent for the sacrilege future time would have shown them. in a Constitutional Convention, gentlemen willing to follow in their footsteps.

As this great and leading truth of Christianity is the beacon light to which the whole world is steering, and in whose beams all will ultimately see, so this grave political idea that all men possess the same inherent rights, is a truth too far in advance of the age, a truth which time will appreciate, a truth which, in practice as well as in theory, the world will ultimately adopt.

The Bible says Thou shalt not steal. Our laws say in effect, Thou shalt not steal. Some men notwithstanding, do steal. Shall we, therefore, repeal the law against larceny, because the principle is true only in theory?

I love this doctrine of equality, because, as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) has beautifully said, "We see our father's faces in it." But more do I love it, because I see in it the faces of posterity. I believe in the doctrine of human progress, and in spite of his errors, I will have faith in man. That policy which is just, and reasonable, and right, man will ultimately adopt. His own interest and happiness demand it. The future, bright and beautiful, is looming up in the distance, with smiles on the face and gladness in the heart. And mankind, in one great brotherhood, will rally around the spurned and condemned idea of the equality of man.

Mr. CHANDLER moved the previous question, which was sustained.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. Howe and it was rejected.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. WATTS;

And the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—72.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bright, Carr, Chandler, Chenoweth, Coats, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Harbott, Hardin, Hogin, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Wiley, Yocum, and Mr. President—44.

So the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on ordering the section as amended to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope this section will not be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It does not contain the truth; and I am far from believing—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Tippecanoe that the question is not debatable, the previous question being still in force.

Mr. PETTIT. Very well. Then I shall vote against ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question was then taken on ordering the section to be engrossed, and upon a division it was decided in the affirmative as follows: ayes 65, noes 42.

Mr. SHERROD moved that the Convention adjourn, which was decided in the negative.

RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the next section in the report providing that "All men shall be secured in the natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. No man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. No law shall in any case whatever control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinions, or interfere with the rights of conscience. No discrimination shall be made by law between religious societies, nor preference be given by law to any mode of worship. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution."

Mr. PETTIT moved to insert two words after the word societies, in the twelfth line. They were the words "or sects;" so as to make the section read: "No discrimination shall be made by law between religious societies or sects, &c."

The amendment was adopted by consent.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to strike out that clause of the section which had just been amended, and insert the following:

"No preference shall ever be given by law to any religious societies or modes of worship; and no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit."

Mr. N. said: These are the words found in a corresponding section of the old Constitution; and as gentlemen have been a little nice in the composition of their sections I would suggest whether the words "No discrimination shall be made between religious societies," is not an inappropriate expression? According to strict grammar to say between religious societies would imply that there were only two of them. If the section is retained this proposition certainly ought to be changed to among. I think, however, that the words of the old Constitution would be better; and I, therefore, move to strike out that clause of the section, and insert the words as I read them from the old Constitution.

Mr. OWEN. If the objection is merely to the word "between" as inappropriate, the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) is well aware that it can be changed by the committee on revision. But if I understand the effect of the amendment it would not only change the phraseology of a considerable portion of the section, but would insert a considerable portion of the section which succeeds it.

Mr. BERRY would ask the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) if he meant to strike out the words "No person shall be incompetent as a witness in consequence of his religious opinions," which was a part of the next section!

Mr. NEWMAN. No.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. NEWMAN, and it was—

Mr. PETTIT moved to amend the amendment by inserting the words "or creed" after the word "worship," which was adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and it was agreed to—ayes 62, noes not counted

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to amend the section by striking out after the words "all men" the words "shall be secured in," and inserting the word "possess," so as to make it read "all men shall possess the natural and indefeasible right," &c. He regarded this right as a present possession, and not as a thing hereafter to be secured. He thought the amendment he suggested would be better than the words in the section as reported by the committee.

Mr. OWEN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson declares that the right exists; but the section as it is reported not only declares that the right exists, but that its existence shall be secured to all men.

Mr. BORDEN. That is the very objection which I have to the section. Suppose that the Legislature should have a majority which was not disposed to allow, the right to be enjoyed. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson is a proper one. We want to have it declared that we "possess" the right.

Mr. OWEN. No Legislature could ever refuse to secure to the people this right without a manifest violation of the Constitution, as the gentleman from Allen must perceive if he reflects for one moment. We provide here in our organic law that all men shall be secured in the right to worship Almighty God, &c. We intended by this that they should be so secured, and it will be the duty of the Legislature to enact such laws as will prevent any and every religious society from being disturbed in their worship.

Mr. HOWE. I would ask, in the name of common sense, why assert the notorious truth, that all men in this country, and in every other country, have a right to worship Almighty God as they please? If you assert anything at all, therefore, why not assert that they shall be secured in that right? I feel satisfied that you cannot insert a more appropriate term. What does it mean? It means, that, inasmuch as all men have a right to worship God according to their own creed, they shall be protected in that right. For example, if their meetings should be wantonly disturbed, that the creating of such disturbance should be regarded as a criminal offense, and punished accordingly. The object of the provision is, that the law should recognize the right and protect it by proper legislation; that is all. It is simply tying up the hands of the Legislature so that they cannot decree otherwise.

Mr. BRIGHT. We are now on the bill of rights, and all that we aim at is a declaration of rights. Among other rights, we propose to say that all men are born free and equal, and that all power is inherent in the people. Then comes the section under consideration, declaring that all men possess the natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. As it is reported, it provides that "all men shall be secured," &c. Now how are they to be secured? We do not propose to dictate future security to the people. We say that it is an inherent right now—not a right that is to be hereafter legislated upon and secured to them. They possess it now. It is a mere declaration of abstract right; and it seems to me, that, instead of saying we shall be secured in the right, we ought to make the declaration that we possess it now, and at all times, and that it cannot be interfered with.

Mr. FOSTER. It appears the difference between the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) and those who sustain the report of the committee, is this: The committee say in their report, that all men shall be secured in the right to worship, &c.; and the gentleman from Jefferson proposes to change this, and make it: "All men possess the right to worship," &c. Now, I would suggest that the matter might be compromised in this way: by adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, and retaining the words as reported by the committee. It will then read: "All men possess, and shall be secured in the right to worship Almighty God," &c. I move to amend the amendment in that way.

Mr. BARBOUR. The term "natural and indefeasible right" is an acknowledgment that we possess it. The very terms used in the section show that we possess the right, and why, therefore, should we repeat the same thing in the section. It appears to me that the section not only says that all men possess the right, but it goes a step further, and says that they shall be secured in it. I think there can be no objection to the phraseology as it now stands. If the right is "natural and indefeasible," of course we possess it.

Mr. SHOUP moved to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on ordering the section, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was decided in the affirmative.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, DEC. 5, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports from committees,

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

The first thing in order being the first section of report No. 11, on its third reading. The section is as follows:

"We declare that all power is inherent in the people; and that all free Governments are, and of right ought to be, founded upon their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends, the people have, at all times, an inalienable right to alter and reform their Government."

The question being: Shall the section pass?

Mr. WATTS moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to insert the amendment offered by him on yesterday. It is as follows:

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural inherent and inalienable rights: among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety;" Following the language of the Constitution of the State of Indiana.

To this amendment,

Mr. STEVENSON had moved a modification which had had been accepted by the gentleman from Dearborn, to the following effect, viz: "All men are created free and equal," &c.; Following the language of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. WATTS. On accepting the modification of the gentleman from Putnam, yesterday, I remarked that I believed it contained the same in substance as that which I proposed; but I was deceived. It does not contain the same. I therefore hope the section will be re-committed to the committee on rights and privileges with instructions to strike out and insert the following:

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural inherent and inalienable rights: among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Mr. STEVENSON. I trust that the section will not be re-committed. I listened yesterday with a good deal of patience to the arguments of the gentleman from Dearborn: and it occurred to me, from hearing not only his arguments, but the arguments of some other gentlemen, that the great object was to flatter Thomas Jefferson. Upon an examination of the section in the old Constitution, it was found that it was not the language used by Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence; and I merely copied the language of the Declaration for the purpose of suiting the gentlemen. And, sir, if they are not satisfied with the Declaration of Independence—if they want something more—why, I have a little something to say about it. I am satisfied with the language of the Declaration of Independence upon this point, and I think it is broad enough to satisfy everybody. How any gentleman can object to this language, I am at a loss to know. There has been nothing stated in my hearing which amounts to a reasonable objection to it; and I am unprepared to answer objections that may exist in the minds of gentlemen, but which have not been advanced here. "All men are created equal." That seems to me to be sufficient to satisfy every man. "They are endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights." If there is anything more required than this, I am not aware of it. I trust that the section will not be re-committed. It seems to me that the language of the Declaration of Independence is quite sufficient, and that gentlemen ought to be entirely satisfied with it.

Mr. GORDON. On yesterday I voted for this section as it now stands, but I believe that its phraseology may be improved by re-committing it. We say in this section that all men are created equal. It is not strictly true that all men are created equal. It is probable that no two men now living were born equal in every respect. There is a very great natural inequality among men. Some are endowed by their Creator with a high order of intellectual powers; others have very limited mental abilities. The minds of men differ as much as their countenances differ from each other. Some are born with that cast of intellect that fits them to lead in the affairs of State; others possess a mind that disposes them to seek the walks of private life. Men are not created intellectually equal, neither are they created physically equal. Some possess naturally great physical strength, while others have but a small portion of it.

The only natural equality among men is an equality of rights; and in this respect all men are equal. The strong have no more natural rights than the weak; the wise than the unwise; the rich than the poor; the white than the black. The Creator has given to all men equal rights and equal privileges. Nor does the fact that one portion of the human family are slaves to the other, contradict the truth of this declaration. It does not follow that because a man is not permitted to exercise his natural rights, he never possessed natural rights.

There is such a thing as being restrained from exercising the rights that naturally belong to us. A man in a state of nature has a right to redress with his own hand any injury he may receive from others, but when he becomes a member of society he is restrained from exercising this natural right. He cheerfully submits to this restraint in order to obtain greater security in the enjoyment of such rights as are reserved to him. Human laws restrain the slave from exercising his most important natural right; yet it does not follow from this that he never possessed these rights. His natural rights are equal to those of his master, and he is deprived of the free exercise of them only by an act of usurpation and tyranny. The subjects of the Russian Autocrat have natural rights equal to those of American citizens, but their government places greater restraint upon the exercise of these rights than our Government does upon the exercise of the rights that appertain to us. All men have by nature equal rights and equal privileges; or, as it is expressed in the old Constitution, "all men are born equally free and independent."

I hope the section will be re-committed, and that the language of the old Constitution may be retained, as it conveys the idea correctly.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. One or two friends on my right proposed yesterday to amend this article, and I favored the proposition to amend at the time, and I now favor it in consequence, partly, of the antiquity of the language proposed to be inserted, and partly in consequence of its being the language of the first article of our present Constitution; and I would inquire whether there is any gentleman in this Convention who has ever heard the slightest objection made to that article by the people of Indiana? I apprehend there is none. I will remark that in the canvass last summer I took the ground that the declaration of rights in our present Constitution was good, and that it required no amendment. I think that we all took that position in the neighborhood of country from which I come. Being pledged, then, to support this article of the Constitution, I wish to put a direct vote upon the entire article. I do not inhale the idea that some gentlemen have entertained, nor am I convinced by the criticisms of some of the learned delegates in this body; and permit me to remark, that I regret exceedingly that some of those criticisms have been made. I regret those which have been made by my young friend who has just taken his seat, although I have no doubt that everything he said was well intended.

Mr. President, I like the language of this section as well as any other language that could be interpolated or adopted in its stead. I do not agree with the opinion of the late Mr. Calhoan, and some others, that men are not born. If we look into history, ancient and modern, sacred or profane, we will find it written that some great men were born. It occurs to me that in some part of the Holy Scriptures it is stated—I will not undertake to quote accurately, not being so attentive a reader as I ought to be—but it occurs to me that it is stated that our Saviour was born in Bethlehem of Judea.

Mr. PETTIT. He was not a man.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I am referring to the Sacred Record. Perhaps by friend over the way disputes its authenticity. Well, sir, I will come down to more modern time. I believe it is stated in the life of Washington, and in the history of the United States, that Washington was born in the State of Virginia.

Sir, my friend opposite, for whom I have great respect—as all gentlemen know I entertain great deference for his opinion—perpetrated a criticism on this phrase, “being born.” I have no doubt he did it for the amusement of the House—to show how he could criticise words like these;—but my friend last up made an unfortunate remark—and I know he will correct himself—that men are not born equal. And another remark of his, that the Autocrat of Russia had been born with higher powers and attributes than other men—

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him, I said this: that the subjects of the Russian Autocrat had the same rights and privileges naturally that we have, but that they did not enjoy those rights and privileges from the fact that their government restricted them.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Now, sir, laying aside all these criticisms the idea is simply this: all that we undertake to declare is this, that God Almighty created all men equal, and that all men are born equal, and by nature have a right to live, and move, and breathe. Sir, the Autocrat of Russia was not created with any of these extrinsic attributes that are now thrown around him. They have all been imposed upon him by society. These matters are all conventional, and in regard to them the people may act their pleasure and violate no natural rights. Mr. President, we are informed that the hand and the power that creates men creates them equal, and in addition to that, whether they are born men or not, after they become men the power that creates them has no respect to their persons. Mr. President, is it possible that the Convention of the State of Indiana will put a declaration into the bill of rights that will deny, if I may be allowed the expression, that God Almighty created all men equal. Have we not equally the right to live, the right to breathe the pure atmosphere of heaven, the right to pursue happiness, the right to enjoy it, and the right to obtain it? For what purpose did the Almighty envelope this earthly ball upon which we live with an atmosphere? Was it for the Autocrat of Russia? was it for those men only who have got these exclusive attributes of society thrown around them? Was it for them alone? No, sir; it was for all that live and breathe. Sir, let me inquire for what purpose did the Almighty give us the power of locomotion? For what did he spread out the extended plains upon the surface of the earth? Was it not for men to walk upon? Now shall not all men be equally entitled to breathe the free air that costs them nothing? Shall they not equally have the right to walk abroad and look upon the brightness of the sun at noon-day? Are not these things self-evident? Why, if we were fed by manna from Heaven they ought to have the right to go and seek it, and to gather it. When it was provided for the children of Israel in the wilderness, they were compelled to go out and gather it at a certain time. They had the right of locomotion, they had the right to live, and breathe, and enjoy the blessings that were showered upon them from Heaven—the hand of Heaven is always even and just in its dispensations.

Mr. President, some gentlemen seem to discover something extraordinary in this article.

They argue as though some men had not the right to live, and move, and breathe the air of heaven, nor to drink of the stream that flows in exhaustless abundance at their feet.

They seem to apprehend that this Convention may do some fell and nefarious act that will contradict the declaration of our fathers, framed by the immortal Jefferson, that by nature all men are equal—“created free and equal.”

Sir, I say the committee on the bill of rights have acted upon the supposition that this Convention would do something to contradict the assertion of natural equality amongst men; and to be consistent, as was explained by the chairman of that committee (Mr. Owen) the other day, they postponed it, awaiting the action of this Convention.

Sir, I have respect to conventional rights as well as natural rights, and I am willing to set up these different barriers between castes in society if necessary, but at the same time I will not outrage the public sentiment of Indiana, or the opinion of the world, by doing a thing not requisite and proper to be done at this time and in this place.

While up I will make a single remark in regard to my learned friend over the way (Mr. Pettit). I place him in that category in regard to things touching social equality. Sir, I admit it is difficult to get up any exact social standard, moral, mental, or physical, and it is as unnecessary in the one case as the other, as social enjoyment depends more upon taste than it does upon anything in morals or mind. It is true that corruption of morals, and imbecility of mind, are loathsome and disgusting to most persons. But he same may be said of personal deformity. My friend might as well say there could be no social equality between himself and the Delegate from Brown, (Mr. Chandler,) because the latter is six inches taller than the former, as to say because some men were learned and some unlearned, they could not enjoy the society of each other.

I appeal to my friend if he thinks it any more indispensable to social enjoyment that men should be capable of thinking alike, than that they should look alike. Sir, his social theory is contradicted by many facts in real life. Is it not frequently the case that men of towering intellect are untried in the delicate relation of husband to ladies of inferior capacity and moderate attainments? Does it not often occur that ladies of high mental endowments, qualified to shine and embellish any station in life, and grace and adorn any society, are united to men who are mere bores in manners and mind, and who, to all appearance, jog on through life in the enjoyment of a full share of social and domestic happiness.

In these matters men must not be over nice. There are many things in real life that will debar any standard, if I may be allowed the expression, that we can fix or set up.

I will give my friend (Mr. Pettit) an instance of misanthropy upon the leveling-down principle. The celebrated John Randolph of Roanoke hated all mankind, except himself, and old maids in particular.

He used to say that he would go ten steps out of his way to kick a sheep—thence there was no social sympathy between him and that innocent animal. But still he was a social being, and showed it eminently in his affection for dogs. It is said of him that in making boarding arrangements he always provided ample accommodation for them in food and lodging, and that on all occasions he was followed by a pack of dogs, caressed and mutually caressing them. When he went Minister to the Court of Russia he took those social companions with him; on them he spent all his sympathies; he placed them on a social equality with himself. Sir, John Randolph and his dogs stood upon an equal footing of social equality. And surely the gentleman from Tippecanoe will not insist that they must have been mentally equal to have induced this friendship. John Randolph, intellectually, was a giant of the age in which he lived, and if alive he might compare favorably, in mind and attainments, with the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

Sir, I cannot bring myself to the conclusions that the gentleman has arrived at, that there can be no social equality between different grades of society, and that the man of letters and the unlearned man cannot associate together, and sympathize with each other. I reject and repudiate his criticism and assertion that men are not born, and the assertion of the gentleman that the first section of the first article of our Constitution is a lie upon its face. I deny it. Sir, it is true to the letter, and is that great political truth that is overturning the world, and just as far as the declaration goes that all men are "born free and equal," the chains of despotism will be broken off; mental and moral darkness will be dissipated; kingdoms will be thrown down and crowns will crumble before it.

[Here the PRESIDENT notified Mr. Smith the fifteen minutes had expired, and he took his seat.]

Mr. NILES. I would not rise at this moment, except to make a personal explanation that seems to have been rendered necessary by the remarks that were made by the Chairman of the committee on rights and privileges, yesterday. It seemed to be inferable from those remarks, that all of the committee had acquiesced in the omission of this section of the old Constitution. Now the gentleman did not, of course, intend to place me in a wrong position. But if such an inference was drawn from those remarks, I need hardly say that it was altogether erroneous. I did not think it worth while to controvert the matter there, or to make a separate report, but it was undoubtedly known to every member of the committee, as it would be expected by every man who ever knew me at any time, or in any place, that unless a new section like that offered by the gentleman from Dearborn had been proposed by some one else, it would have been offered by me. I have no hesitation in saying that I should have looked with alarm upon the omission of this section by this Convention. I should have regarded it as indicating a downward tendency in our affairs. And though I was not aware that a motion to recommit would be made this morning, I will say that I did regret on yesterday, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Putnam was accepted by the gentleman from Dearborn. I prefer, sir, the language of our old bill of rights. I prefer it not because it may be expressed in the purest English. Great truths have often been uttered in homely style. But they have none the less influenced the mind and destiny of the world. Now I am attached to those old words, because they fairly and fully and boldly speak out in plain unvarnished and unmistakable language, the spirit of the fundamental truths of the Declaration of Independence—those great truths upon which our social fabric, and our political liberties all rest. It not only says that men are born free and equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, such as the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, but it carries out the sentiment in such a manner that he who runs may read—that every man, woman, and child within the limits of the State, shall be capable of understanding the nature of the truths that we assert—that among those rights are those of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety. And, sir, what danger, or what impropriety can there be in using this language? It is language that was used by our fathers and valued by them. Sir, it is dangerous to tamper or trifle with such great rights. Trifle not with the essential elements of liberty, not at least with the rights of our own race. If we must assume other positions which are in controversion of them, let us still adhere to those truths in relation to ourselves and to our posterity, that are essential to our and their welfare and happiness. And, sir, I confess that I feel an attachment for these words, because they were placed here by our fathers. Other people have placed a high value upon mere scraps of their early history. Why need we go to the opposite extreme and blot out every word and act of our predecessors? When they uttered a noble sentiment, why may not we be content to retain it in the form in which it was expressed by them?

The gentleman from Posey has remarked that he feels an attachment to the State of Connecticut, because he married his wife there. I feel an attachment to this language, not only because it was used by men of whom I believe that truer, more high minded, more liberty-loving, more patriotic men, have never lived, but, sir, because, though I was born in a far distant State, some of that blood flows in my children's veins. And, sir, on an occasion like this, when men seem afraid to assert essential truths lest at the next moment they should give them the lie, it is not too serious or too much in earnest to utter such a sentiment. Sir, I would even now hope at this late day, that gentlemen would not reject this language, but that they would at least retain, in so many words, this one section as it was penned by the men who laid the foundations of our State. Let no Vandal spirit seek to obliterate from the Constitution, every word which was placed there by our fathers.

Mr. ZENOR. I am opposed, sir, to the motion for the re-commitment of this section. But I have not risen so much for the purpose of discussing the question that is before the Convention, as for the purpose of admonishing gentlemen against a further waste of time. I consider it a duty which I owe to those who sent me here, and perhaps to the country, to make this suggestion. I had hoped that the orators of this Convention would by this time have exhausted all their stores of knowledge, and have been ready to proceed to vote. We are progressing but slowly; and, sir, the people of this State are taking notice of the slowness of our progress. It may be that any thing that I may say will fail to have any influence with gentlemen here, but I hope that the orators of this Convention will be admonished to make their speeches shorter and fewer. Sir, we have been here almost three months, and what have we done? If we proceed in the manner in which we are now progressing, it will take us at least three months to get through with our business. Are the people prepared to tolerate such a protraction of the session of this Convention? It is true, gentlemen may be desirous that their speeches should go before the people; but when they consider that each one of the long speeches that they make costs the country from fifty to a hundred dollars, they may be assured that the people will be dissatisfied. Sir, I have been for a long time in the Legislature, I have served here for many weeks together, but I must acknowledge that my patience has never been so much tried as it has since this Convention met. Sir, I can bear without complaint, perhaps, as much as any other man; but I think it is time that we should begin to make better progress with our work. If the minority are disposed to retard business by moving to re-commit every section that is acted upon here, we shall never get through, and we may just as well pass a resolution to adjourn and go home, and let the people send other Delegates. I have felt it my duty to make these few remarks; and I have nothing further to add.

Mr. KELSO. A few words, sir, in reply to the gentleman from Harrison. We have heard so much about the extraordinary greatness of Indiana, about her relative position, her high standing among the States of this Union, that I think it is only necessary for us to look at the time that the Conventions of other States have occupied in re-modeling the Constitutions of those States to be convinced that the gentleman is altogether mistaken as to time being uselessly spent by us. We have not yet consumed half the time that has been occupied by the Conventions of other States. And, sir, if the State of Indiana occupies so high a position in point of wealth and the numerical strength of her population, should we not occupy a proportionate time in framing her organic law? If we apply this rule, we must necessarily set ten or fifteen weeks to do the State justice, so that the gentleman who seems so extraordinarily anxious to get through with the work in a few weeks will be sadly mistaken if he expects that when it is done it will be properly done.

The forming of a Constitution is not like the work which Lady Macbeth was counseling the execution of, when she said:

"If, 't were done;
When 't is done, 't were well done
If 't were done quickly."

Now, sir, a proposition has been made to re-commit a section which was passed yesterday, with instructions to strike it out and insert another section in its place. I voted yesterday against the passage of the section, but I did not cast that vote because I had any less regard for the language it contained than those gentlemen had who voted for it. But, sir, coming here as we do, to form an organic law for the State, we come prepared, as we all confess, to act above and independent of party, and many of us in this Hall, if we do that which we believe to be right, may find ourselves running counter to the opinions of both our political and personal friends. Now I think I may be supposed to know something of what we came here for. It was not to make a Constitution for the whole world, nor for the United States, nor for any other people than the people of Indiana. And, sir, some of us came here instructed upon certain questions which were expected to be brought before this body, and I, for one, am so instructed, especially in regard to the admission of persons of color within the State hereafter. Perhaps the most solemn pledge that I gave to my people was that I would vote uniformly against permitting them to emigrate into this State.

Only yesterday I voted against the re-commitment of this section, for the purpose of inserting this same amendment. The after action of this Convention will show when compared with what we have already adopted that the falsehood is already sufficiently large for any reasonable purpose, and if we amend as proposed it will only make it worse. Now if I could vote throughout in accordance with the language contained in the proposed amendment, I would cheerfully vote for its insertion; but as I cannot do that, I do not choose to lay a snare to catch myself in. In deciding a sentiment which I cannot carry out and keep my pledge to the people, I will not cast my vote so as to entrap myself if I know it. If I vote from the proposed amendment I must hereafter vote under instructions from the people, so as to give to it the black lie on its face. It is true the language is beautiful, but can we not make a Constitution that will be sufficiently good for the State of Indiana without having it in that form.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. Will you deny the sentiment?

Mr. KELSO. No. I say I believe in it, and I approve of the language; but shall I vote to ingraft it in the Constitution, and by the face of another vote I have given, or rather that I shall give, and must give, in another part of the Constitution, give to this the lie? No, sir, I choose to be more consistent. My conscience must submit to my duty to my constituents in this instance. Because it is a matter, and I now repeat what I was about to say when the gentleman interrupted me, and that is cannot this Convention make a Constitution ample and sufficient for all the purposes of a free government without having this section there at all? I maintain that we can. Now what is it? "that the great and essential principles of free government may be recognized and established." That they may be recognized and established! Now in the name of God I ask if the principles of free government have not been recognized and established in the country for the last seventy years. Can we re-establish them? You cannot re-establish that which is already in existence; nor can you give them any additional strength. If each member of this Convention were a minister of the Gospel, and should solemnly repeat each morning the Lord's Prayer, would it give to it any greater solemnity? Certainly not. Then would the repetition of this language, embodying principles that have been established for two-thirds of a century, give to those principles any additional force or effect? I say it would not. Then, sir, I say we can do without it.

Well now what is the language proposed to be inserted? It is that all men are born free and equal. That, sir, is not true; they are not born equal—men are born subject to the laws of the country in which they are born; and if those laws do not confer upon all men in the government equal privileges, then, sir, they are not born equal. Shall I then be required to vote for such a declaration. If it were confined in its application to the State of Indiana, it might be true that all are born free, but not equal. But the declaration is general, and it is not limited; an inference may be drawn from it that we do not intend, and it is absolutely useless. "And they shall have certain inalienable rights." Now what is an inalienable right? It is such a right as the subject possessing it cannot himself dispose of. It is something that belongs to him that he cannot sell, barter, swap, or give away. Among these rights is that of enjoying life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. Well now let us take the last clause. It is proposed to provide that negroes shall not enjoy property upon equal footing with the white man in Indiana. Well, he is a man. If he was born in Indiana he was born equally free with a white man, and it may be possible equally independent. Now if we carry out the principle that has been proposed to be introduced into another part of our Constitution, that the negro shall not be entitled to enjoy property equally with the white men, if we vote for that provision, and at the same time make the declaration here proposed to be made, we shall stultify ourselves. One or the other must be a positive falsehood. Now I do not choose to record my vote for both of these propositions; because when I go home my constituents may ask me which of these propositions I consider the right one, as both cannot be true, and intend to adhere to!

I maintain that the proposition that all men have an equal right to enjoy life, liberty, and property, is not strictly true. For instance, if a white man meets a black man upon the public highway in Indiana, and they are alone together, and the white man falls upon the other with a bludgeon, and beats him unmercifully the black man is not permitted to go into a court of justice and make an affidavit upon which the offender can be arrested; or if the man be arraigned, the black man cannot give testimony by which he could be convicted. I ask then, if the black man has equal rights with the white. I say he has not. I say then, if you adopt both of these propositions, one or the other must be false. That is the reason why I voted against this proposition yesterday. If I could carry out the principle, and do common justice to the people of Indiana, and redeem the pledges that I made at home, I would most willingly vote for it, for I like the sentiment; I think it is a good one. But I cannot vote for both, so I choose to do in this matter as I promised the people I would do.

I am much obliged by the gentleman from

Dearborn (Mr. Watts) making this motion; it has afforded me an opportunity to explain the reasons for my vote on yesterday. I freely confess that I am governed in this vote by the circumstances which surround me.

Mr. OWEN. This subject is one worthy mature deliberation; yet I should not have risen, but for an allusion made to me as chairman of the committee, by my friend from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) for friend, I am sure, I may call him.

The gentleman will do me the justice, I know, to believe that, in what I stated yesterday, it was the furthest from my thoughts to place him in a false position. I spoke of the action of the committee, that expression being always construed to mean a majority of the committee. It would have been unparliamentary for me to allude to the action of the minority; nor in any discussion here, is it the province, or the right even, of a chairman so to do. I merely said, or meant to say, that the majority of that committee had decided, for the present, not to report the section of which I was speaking.

Now, to come to the point immediately before us:

The Convention has adopted, as a portion of the first section of our bill of rights, a clause from the Declaration of Independence; and with that clause they have re-placed that declaration in the old Constitution which speaks of the inalienable right of all men to acquire, possess, and protect property.

The gentleman from Laporte says he venerates these words as a legacy from our political forefathers.

Mr. President, I value words, no matter whence derived, only when they are followed by deeds. I value no words that are mere words—empty words—declaring what is not to be carried out. But is the gentleman himself prepared to carry out the declaration he so much venerates? So far as the very difficult question regarding negroes and their rights to property is concerned, no doubt he is prepared; he will vote with the minority; and on that point, therefore, his action and the declaration he advocates harmonize. But did he not, the other day, vote against the section that was passed, and may yet be re-considered, securing to married women the rights to property, of which the common law utterly deprives them? Did he not, by that vote, deny to one-half the white citizens of this State the right to acquire, to possess, to protect property. And if so, with what propriety—with what truth—with what regard to the most ordinary consistency—can he propose to insert in the Constitution a provision which his own vote thus flagrantly violates?

The gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe) attempted yesterday to prove to us that the common law principle, as to the property of married women, was no violation of the declaration in question. And how does he set about it? He says that such rights are guaranteed, "under certain restrictions;" and that it is the province of law to determine what these restrictions shall be. I reply that to restrict, is one thing, to destroy, another. Married women, while they remain married, have, by the common law, no active or available rights of property whatever. Their personal estate has been vested absolutely in another; every dollar from real estate goes the same way. They have no property. There is no regulation about it. It is taken from them. Are declared rights to be so construed? Under color of restricting, are we to destroy? Under pretense of regulating, are we to regulate out of existence? Then a declaration of right is but an idle mockery. The promise is kept to the ear, and to the ear alone.

But women, says the gentleman, are not obliged to marry. So Paul told us eighteen hundred years ago; but he hinted, at the same time, that if they did not, they might chance to do worse. [Laughter.] The gentleman knows very well, that, as a general rule, the married state is the natural and necessary condition of women. This is an unworthy evading of the issue.

I repeat it sir; I value words but as the types of things. High-sounding words, if they carry with them no practical results, I value not.

For these reasons, I adhere to the opinion, that, for the present, at all events, we shall do well to abstain from adopting the section referred to, from our old Constitution.

Mr. HOWE. I am sure that gentlemen who have argued as to the impropriety of the use of these words, taken from the Declaration of Independence, have done so under a misapprehension of their meaning.

These words, sir, were penned by Mr. Jefferson, and endorsed by his co-patriots. Mr. Jefferson was a scholar as well as a patriot. No man in this Convention, and I need not say that I do not disparage any member of it by that assertion, is the superior to Mr. Jefferson, in point of literary attainments. Not only, sir, are these words suitable and appropriate, but they are beautiful and classical. No words in the English language could be more pertinent to express the idea the drafters of the Declaration intended to convey.

"All men are born equally free and independent," declares the first section in our present Constitution; and with great propriety, and "have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights;"—that is to say, as I remarked yesterday, by the law of nature in contradistinction to human laws, all men are free and equal; yet this does not affirm that man may not become unequal under human laws. But it is a great fundamental truth, that lies at the foundation of all human governments, that men possess these inherent and inalienable rights. The word "inalienable" is used to show that no voluntary transfer of these rights by any part of mankind, is binding in respect of that transfer, and is thus inalienable.

But this does not contravene the power of man by superior physical force, or by the public or municipal laws of States, to divest other men of those rights. That fact is implied; but it is no reason for dispensing with this declaration of sentiment.

Gentlemen say that, from the fact that slavery exists in this country, there is a notorious inequality of rights, and also present the assumed fact that we will forbid the immigration of negroes into this State, and prohibit their right to hold property. There is nothing inconsistent, even in view of this state of things, in inserting these words from the Declaration, in our bill of rights. It only shows us one of the fundamental truths, "self-evident" to all whose moral perceptions are not obtuse, or blinded by selfishness. There is nothing contradictory involved in its insertion. It is simply a truthful declaration.

I do not see, sir, the force of the argument of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that we contradict ourselves by retaining these words, and yet not allowing to woman her equal rights. As I understand this matter, sir, the rights of married women, in respect to their property, have little to do with the declaration of the rights of mankind as conferred upon them.

What human laws may do and say on this subject of married women's property, is unimportant; it does not alter the laws of nature, and there can be nothing conflicting. This, sir, is a great fundamental truth that should not be dispensed with. I thank the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) for the beautiful figure he gave us in some remarks on this subject yesterday;—they have been before my mental vision ever since—"we can see our father's faces in these words," said he. The immortal band that signed the Declaration of Independence, appear to stand up before us when we read these words.

I have an amendment, sir, which, while up, I will offer to the instructions—and I desire then to say a few words in relation to it. I wish to amend the instructions so as to add the second section of the old Constitution, in addition to the one before us.

That, sir, will restore the sections of the old Constitution as they were. Section two of the first article of the old Constitution concludes with this sentence: "For the advancement of these ends, they (the people) have, at all times, an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter or reform their government in such manner as they may think proper." To this I wish to add these words at the conclusion, "In accordance with their Constitutions."

That, sir, was the amendment I proposed yesterday, but by some mistake, the question on it was not correctly put, and I now propose it again for consideration.

I will not argue the question now, but simply say that yesterday I made what might be considered a somewhat abstract argument—not a general or appropriate kind of argument—but in this case I thought it necessary, because it looked to practical results. It is an abstract question, but its solution lies at the foundation of our rights. It has become an important question. The very fact that so many States are remodeling their Constitutions, is an interesting fact—a momentous one for good or evil.

Here, then, is a practical question—whether ad libitum we shall have the right of amending or totally changing the whole structure of the government of this State.

What, sir, I ask, is tyranny? It is a word of Greek derivation. Originally it signified the unrestrained and unlimited government of one man. In Athens there were at one time, thirty tyrants; at another time a single tyrant, Pysistratus.

In this country, the whole sovereign power, since the Revolution, has been considered as lodged in the hands of the people. In every country it must be lodged somewhere, and in this country, it is lodged with the people. But for the people to exercise that power en masse, is impossible; and yet, having that power, they have the right to delegate it. They must exercise it by delegation, or not at all; and thus they do, and have the right to say how long it shall be delegated, or whether it may be resumed at any time.

A Constitution is a delegation of sovereign power to different departments of government, which, taken together, receive all that power. The people retain the right in general, to declare at the ballot box, who shall exercise the functions of those departments from time to time, but they are always supposed to be, and, indeed, are filled. This may at first seem an abstract question of little importance, but in reality, it is a vital question of liberty. If a Constitution be a mere restriction of popular sovereignty, there is a portion of sovereignty left which is practically false, for the whole sovereign power, during the existence of the Constitution, is not in the people; otherwise they should meet together and perform the functions of sovereignty. Besides this doctrine of restriction is a manifest exhortation to revolution and anarchy. It comes to this, that the people are incapable of binding themselves by any recorded prohibition of the amendment of their Constitution, for a given period, which they make.

Every other sovereign in the world is capable of binding himself. Why not a popular majority, which is the original sovereign with us? Public liberty equally demands that the rule be the same in either case.

When the people reserve or possess the right to re-model or change their Constitution, this is not a restriction, but a reservation, or more properly, a power of revocation of that sovereignty which they have delegated. But it is said the people declare, in their Constitution, the manner in which power shall be exercised, which is nothing more than a restriction of sovereign power. This is a contradiction in terms, for it implies that sovereign power has been delegated, which is repugnant to the supposition of the restrictionists. All power is really delegated, but limitations are placed on its exercise.

The people then by their Constitutions delegate their power; and they have the right to declare in those Constitutions when and under what circumstances they will resume it again.

As I said yesterday, this argument if taken in its ultimate consequences leads to a position which is undoubtedly true, that the people may delegate their sovereign power for ten, twenty, or any number of years. It does not, however, deny the abstract right of revolution. When a government becomes intolerable a revolution may occur; possibly it may be a peaceful one—but a revolution it will be, notwithstanding.

No government, however, can admit this for it strikes at its very existence; it would be nothing more nor less than indorsing the power of revolution.

We must restrict sovereign power, and if we desire stable government we must admit the idea that sovereign power is capable of restricting itself. If this is not done the idea of tyranny or irresponsible power is at once realized and called into existence, and that definition is absolutely correct; and we thus realize every hateful element of evil comprehended in the meaning of the word tyranny since the first ages of the civilized world. There is no means by which you can have a government of true liberty, unless you can restrict the sovereign power.

I care not where tyranny exists, whether in a single tyrant or in a majority of the whole people, it must be limited, and the right of taking back the delegated power at pleasure must not be admitted in our Constitutions and practically developed. If it be formed to responsible government, Conventions and decrees will then take the place of legislative assemblies and well digested laws.

Mr. WILEY moved to lay the amendment with instructions upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. That motion, the gentleman I hope understands, will carry the section with it.

Mr. WILEY. I move the previous question then, sir.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention second the call for the previous question?

The call was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the main question be now put?

This was so ordered by consent.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the passage of the section as it now stands.

On this motion the yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 114, nays 10:

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Bidle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—114.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Gordon, Hogin, Howe, Moore, Sherrod, and Walpole—10.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.

The second section of No. 11 was then taken up and read a third time.

The original section is as follows:

"All men shall be secured in the natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. No man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent. No law shall, in any case whatever, control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinions, or interfere with the rights of conscience. No discrimination shall be made by law between religious societies, nor preference be given by law to any mode of worship. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institu-

The question being on the passage thereof—

The yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and the Secretary reported as follows—yeas 122, nays none:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Bidle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—122.

None voted in the negative.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

RELIGIOUS TESTS.

The third section of No. 11 was then taken up and read a second time as follows:

SEC. —. No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness, in consequence of his opinions on matters of religion."

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend by striking out all before the word "no" in the second line.

The motion was adopted.

The section as amended was then ordered to be engrossed.

MANNER OF ELECTIONS.

The fourth section of No. 11 providing "that all elections shall be free and equal," was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. PETTIT moved to strike out the entire section.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. OWEN moved to strike out the word "equal" and insert the word "easy."

The motion was disagreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed.

PERPETUITIES AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I propose, as an amendment, the following additional section:

SECTION —. Perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the spirit of a free State, and ought not to be allowed.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would ask the gentleman to explain what he means by "perpetuities."

Mr. READ of Monroe. The delegate from Wayne is a legal gentleman, and surely ought to know the legal meaning of the word "perpetuities." It is a long time, sir, since I have looked into law books, and never as a professional student; but if I understand the meaning of the word, it is the direction which an individual may permanently give to real estate. I think that they are contrary to the spirit of a free government. Some of the States have so declared in their Constitutions, in reference to monopolies as well as perpetuities. I think both are contrary to the spirit of a free State, and that we ought to make a declaration of that kind in our Bill of Rights.

Mr. RARIDEN. The word "perpetuities" has a very extensive meaning, sir, and I do not know what the gentleman from Monroe, in his proposition, intends to comprehend under it. If he intends by it to say that the family shall not succeed to property or real estate in the statutory line, I go against it. If he intends that the owner of property rights shall not be perpetual, and he shall not distribute it by testamentary disposition, I also go against it. If he means simply that there shall not be entailed estates here, as in Great Britain, I do not care much about it.

My objection, sir, is to the breadth of the declaration—that there shall be no perpetuities or monopolies. What the gentleman might consider a monopoly I might not. What I might consider a monopoly he might regard as of infinite benefit to mankind, or incidentally so. What he might consider a monopoly in the hands of one or more individuals, I might regard as a measure that would result to the general good of mankind. I object, then, sir, to these general and sweeping terms which have no clear and fixed meaning in a Constitution. What they will be deemed to mean will depend upon the temper of those who may act upon them. I see no necessity for it, sir. I feel perfectly content to let those who come after us settle these questions in their own way. All these propositions, sir, in regard to monopolies that I have heard, are based upon the assumption that those who come after us will be incompetent to act for themselves in regard to the subject. There, sir, the gentleman differs with me. I believe in the possession of knowledge of the science of government. I believe there will be considerable experience gained up to the time when the people of this State next meet to form a new Constitution or to alter the one we make. I want, then, sir, those who come after us to have the benefit of their own experience, and have the right in their own hands of doing their own business in their own way. And if those who come after us think proper to perpetuate real estate in the hands of families, it is not for me to grumble at it.

There is a good deal of talk about consistency, and some gentlemen say they would not go for this broad doctrine of human rights because they do not expect to live up to it. Well, sir, there are many things in which we come short. We do not live up to our profession as Christians. There is a model of perfection held up to the human eye, as Christians, and we come very far short of its perfection in our sins; and so in our political administration of matters. Our fathers put forth to the world broad declarations of the rights of man, but we do not carry them all out; and this fault I am sure is with us, and not the declarations.

All conveyances and all gifts for benevolent purposes have clauses of perpetuity in them; and, indeed, to destroy their perpetuity you destroy the thing itself, and defeat the purpose of benevolence very frequently.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Great general principles, lying at the foundation of human liberty, are incorporated into that part of our written constitutions called the Bill of Rights. I shall not discuss the question whether such a bill is an essential part of a constitution. It is a settled point with us, that we are to have one. It only remains for us to determine what principles shall go into it.

Is the principle now proposed such a one as ought to be incorporated into the Constitution? I hold that it is. Whatever is recognized by the Constitution becomes infixed in the minds of the people. The rising generation of men grow up indoctrinated in their political principles by the Constitution. In monarchical governments, the throne and the altar are sacred in the feelings of men. In republics, it is the constitution and the altar. The principle contained in the proposed section, is one which, in both the subjects embraced, is, I believe, acknowledged in the common law.

The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) is fearful of these general and sweeping declarations, as he calls them. He wished to know the meaning of the word perpetuities. I believe that is as well fixed as any term used in the common law. It is, as I have before said, long since I examined books on the subject, but I thought there was no doubt as to the legal import of the word perpetuity. It is, according to my recollection, the settlement of property in such a way that it must go in the particular course directed by the grantor, and without any power of alienation. This is contrary to the policy of society, and especially injurious in a free government. It subverts the true end of property. Why, sir, even in England perpetuities are not tolerated, and such, according to my recollection, is the distinct doctrine of the books. Property ought not to be tied up by the dead, so that it will not subserve the purposes of the living generation of men. I am quite sure the declaration is not in advance of the spirit of the English law. Mankind have always manifested a strange propensity to continue their control over the property which they have possessed, beyond their own lives, and if not prevented by law, to establish its use and descent for all time. Hence, entailed estates, perpetuities, and that direction of property by a past generation, which prevents its free and full use by the present generation. In a new State, in laying the foundations of society, I can see nothing improper in entering a declaration against all such abuses in the control of property.

Does the gentleman desire a definition of a monopoly? I believe it is defined to be an exclusive right granted to a man, or set of men, to employ their labor or capital in some particular manner. There was a time when almost every kind of business was carried on by the aid of monopolies. But in the progress of free principles, they have come to be considered odious;—that is the term which I believe the law applies to them. They are prejudicial to trade, hostile to the great principles of equality of rights—beneficial to the few and injurious to the many. The law and the science of political economy looks upon a monopoly in the same way.

If there is any use in having any great fundamental principles go into the Constitution, it seems to me that the proposed declaration may suitably enough find a place in the Bill of Rights.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. PRESIDENT: I wish to make a remark on the meaning of the word "perpetuities," as used in this amendment. I do not mean, sir, to detain the Convention with a critical, legal, or etymological definition of that word, but would give what I understand to be its practical effect. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) says that he believes in the progress of the human mind, and the general advancement of mankind, and, therefore, would not have this word in the Constitution. His logic does not appear to me to be sound. I believe in those principles as heartily as the gentleman, and, therefore, I would have this word in the Constitution. I would not bind those who are to follow us by perpetuities. There are certain natural rights which mankind never can control. One generation has no moral right to bind subsequent generations. We should not give direction to great and universal rights, such as the right to rocks for the building of State works and national edifices, to rivers for the purpose of navigation, to forests for timber trees, and even the right to control lands forever,—so as to bind them in perpetuity. These great elements of national strength came to us immediately from the hand of the Creator, and if destroyed cannot be reproduced by man. Every generation should use them fairly with a view to the claims of succeeding generations. I will give the gentleman an example of a perpetuity—such a one as I wish to avoid by this amendment. The ordinance of '37 which we talk so much about, provides that: "The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, &c., &c."

Now, sir, this shows the utter futility of man undertaking to do more than he can perform. This provision in the ordinance has been, and must ever be repeatedly violated. Every dam constructed across the Wabash river by the State is directly against that provision. Every mill-dam, sir, erected by individual enterprise directly contravenes it. A vast majority of these tributaries are wholly useless for navigation. You may step across many of them. The carrying places between were then by Indian trails, and have long since been fenced up and cultivated. They could not now be opened. Sir, what folly then for man to write down on paper a contradiction to what God has engraved on the universe! Sir, no legislature, no court, no human power can enforce that part of this celebrated ordinance. It is to keep out of such absurdities that I support this proposition.

Mr. NEWMAN. I think perhaps that gentlemen have mistaken the meaning of the word "perpetuities" to some extent. It may accomplish the purpose designed, but in a more general sense it will cut off the dearest rights of citizens of the State. He who conveys lands to another conveys to him simply a life estate, if he uses other words that he will transfer to him, his heirs, or assigns, he uses words of perpetuity; and the right of transfer to others to hold, to them and their heirs and assigns, to all time, includes words of perpetuity. He who devises to another, to his children, to strangers or educational institutions real perpetuity of estate, to be held by heirs and assigns, or by institutions and successors, gives to it words of perpetuity. It perpetuates the same power in the grantee that the grantor possessed. The fact that persons may entail property on their children is an example of perpetuity.

Mr. BIDDLE. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) gives us an example of fee simple as a perpetuity. That undoubtedly may become a perpetuity. It is possible that it may continue forever in the grantee and his heirs, but not at all probable, practically speaking; for it must be remembered that it does not exist a single day without the power in the owner to sell and convey. That which is subject to be cut off and changed at any time by the will of the owner will never become a perpetuity in our government. A perpetuity is where the subject matter of it is so bound that the present or subsequent owner has not the power to change, or cut it off by his own act. Such a compact, I must insist, is against the spirit of our government and people, and opposed to the rational progress of the age.

Mr. NEWMAN. If I understand the definition of the gentleman from Cass, as he gave it, it expresses but a limited portion of the word "perpetuity." In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) whether words of perpetuity and a perpetuity are not different, I would say that, if you use words of perpetuity which tend to perpetuate a particular thing, in a particular way, it is to every intent and purpose a perpetuity. This should not be with the class of cases he has in mind. That was the objection; it was too large a ground, and is in conflict with itself.

The class of perpetuities to which the gentleman refers is simply a class of entailment, and is within the control of the Legislature, who, for the last twenty-five years, have legislated against it. They have directed that entailment shall not exist, nor any power to perpetuate estates in a particular line, say to the oldest heir or male, to certain female heirs. It becomes a general estate; but still it is a perpetuity in its most general sense.

The same objection is maintained against monopolies. It cannot be denied that the charter of the Indiana University, to which funds have been appropriated to keep it in existence, for all time to come, is a perpetuity. No man can doubt that it perpetuates its property in a particular line, and that there is no power to direct it in any other way justly. You have a College Fund in the State, which is a perpetuity in a particular way; and on the same principle, and in the same manner, property can be vested in the State or in individuals.

You have erected a University at Greencastle. It has been endowed by the donations and gifts of the people of this State; yet it will be a perpetuity so long as there is a good Government existing in the State. To a certain extent, these institutions are monopolies; for they possess ample means over and above ordinary citizens to compete with individuals in educating the youth of the country. This is a monopoly designed for great and good purposes. So it will be in all those cases where the grantee and successors receive and apply an estate or funds for educational, religious, scientific, or benevolent purposes. Still the Legislature are not bound to grant such monopolies, although it is free and ought to grant, under all circumstances where the public good would be subserved by any such monopoly.

In regard to entails, I certainly am as much opposed to them as any one. It is one of that peculiar class of perpetuities which my friend from Monroe looks upon as so odious.

Gentlemen ought to be careful how they introduce words into our Constitution which might be misunderstood or misconstrued.

Mr. HOLMAN said:

I would suggest a case, sir, where a perpetuity ought to be allowed. It is where a benevolent man grants property, either real or personal, for the sole purpose of endowing an institution of learning or of benevolence. The strong, and in most instances, the controlling motive, which would induce a man of enlarged liberality to set apart the labors of a life-time to the advancement of human happiness, is the hope that the effects of his benevolence may be perpetual. The cause of education, religion, and the general interests of humanity, have, during the past and present century, received a new impulse from the endowment of institutions having the advancement of those interests in view, by private and public munificence, induced alone by the prospect of perpetuity.

Every grant to trustees and their successors for a specific object, where the power of alternation does not vest in the trustees, or in the persons beneficially entrusted, creates a perpetuity; and there are but few, if any, gentlemen on this floor, who do not remember of some instance of a perpetuity created for educational or other benevolent purposes.

I mention this very usual species of perpetuities for the purpose of showing that the section proposed by the gentleman from Monroe might tend to defeat grants of the most useful and benevolent character, and in the permanency of which the dearest interests of society are involved.

Every other species of perpetuities, however, except those created for educational and eleemosynary purposes, are, in my humble judgment, contrary to the genius and spirit of our republican institutions.

The language of the proposed section is manifestly too general: "Perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the genius of a republican government, and therefore should not be allowed."

There are instances within my own knowledge of private grants made years ago, for the general purpose of education. If the incorporation of such a section into our organic law did not defeat such, it would at least prevent grants of an equally benevolent character from being created in future.

Entailments of property in families, trust estates, and all other perpetuities of a like character, for the purpose of fostering and perpetuating aristocratic establishments, are always anti-republican in their tendencies, and should not be allowed; and, in fact, are not allowed by our present system of jurisprudence. Grants made in perpetuity for public purposes are created for a very different purpose, and produce very different results.

I fully endorse the sentiment of the proposed section as to monopolies. In every sense they are utterly inconsistent with the genius of our Government, independent of the manifest injustice of conferring, by law, on individuals or associations, franchises not enjoyed by the body of the people. The necessary tendency of a monopoly is to wield a concentrated power ever at war with individual rights.

The section, as it now stands, is too general; properly modified as to perpetuities, it must produce the most beneficial results.

Mr. KENT moved to amend as follows: Strike out the words "ought not," and insert the words "shall not."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Mr. PRESIDENT: As the section offered by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) embraces new principles for constitutional reform, and may be of more importance, affecting a greater variety of causes than the friends of the measure are at present apprised of; and that all may have an opportunity to examine the question fully, I move to lay the section and amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

OPERATION OF THE LAWS.

The fifth section of No. 11 was then taken up, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed, as follows:

"The operation of the laws shall never be suspended, except by the authority of the Legislature."

SECURITY OF PERSONS AND PROPERTY.

The sixth section of No. 11 was then taken up, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed, as follows:

"SEC. — The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable search or seizure shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or thing to be seized."

PRIVILEGES OF THE PEOPLE.

The seventh section of No. 11 was then taken up and read a second time, as follows:

"SEC. — No law shall restrain any of the inhabitants of this State from assembling together, in a peaceable manner; nor from instructing their representatives; nor from applying to the Legislature for redress of grievances."

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend by striking out the entire section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The people have a right to assemble together in a peaceable manner to consult for their common good; to instruct their representatives, and to apply to the Legislature for a redress of their grievances."

The amendment was rejected.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed without amendment.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF ADVENTURERS.

Mr. HOWE. I propose, sir, to offer the following section as an amendment to the article:

"Every person who shall unlawfully engage in the invasion of the territory of a foreign nation with whom the United States are at peace, shall, in consequence of such offense, be ipso facto disfranchised, and rendered incapable of holding any office under this Constitution."

I have offered this amendment, sir, because I thought it to be right. It is known to every member of this Convention that the greatest difficulty in all republican governments, and to which they are most liable, is a species of propagandism and a tendency of adventurers, under these governments, seeking to uproot and overrun neighboring countries; and this has been a universal theme of reproach abroad to our Government. I appeal to gentlemen whether it is not notorious that citizens of the United States, in the East, the South, and West, did not long since engage in a piratical expedition upon the people of a nation with whom we were at peace; and it is a known fact that that offense has not received its adequate punishment. Now, sir, it is the duty of the people of this State to take this matter in hand, as far as they can, and in one point of view, this is the proper place for us to do it.

It is quite possible, sir, that no penalty under this amendment will in point or fact, ever take place—but then an action in this manner cannot fail of having a good moral effect.

There has been a question raised whether in a legal point of view a man could expatriate himself and resign his allegiance to this Government. This is a question that has never been decided.

But in a moral point of view, certainly, it should be conceded that a man has expatriated himself, and justly forfeited all political rights if he engages in any expedition of the kind I have alluded to.

Suppose an army composed of citizens of one State to invade a foreign territory with the government of which the United States are at peace, and these governments are thus embroiled in war; is it too much to demand of that State to place a mark of disapprobation on those citizens, if her laws permit it. So far as foreign governments are concerned, the States have merged their sovereignty in that of the General Government. That General Government has not the power of disfranchising a citizen of a State in respect to his rights as a citizen of that State, and is not that State by every implied obligation of justice and good faith to restrain her citizens from such piratical outrages, as far as she can? Manifestly, she is; and in view of the present tendency of affairs in this country, that State is doing no more than exact justice, which thus attempts to restrain her citizens.

The States have not the right to pass criminal laws on this subject, and proceed by indictment against those citizens who violate these laws. The offense is not one against her sovereignty, but that of the United States. All the aid, then, which the State can afford the General Government, is the little mite which is indicated in this amendment, and this, upon every moral consideration, she is bound to extend. One object of a Constitution is to guard against evils which can be reached in no other way, and a permanent and extensive evil should be met as far as practicable by a permanent remedy. Are we patriots? Do we wish by all means in our power to give our Government stability at home, and character abroad? We aid these objects by the passage of this section. The energies and valor of our young men, whose bravery and force of character have been so signally demonstrated, should be invited to the avocations of peace. The elements of character which they possess will always make them good soldiers when their country may demand their services in a lawful war, and those elements will always be retained without the stimulus afforded by unlawful invasions.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I was not aware, sir, that this Convention was authorized to take under its care and control the business of the Congress of the United States; and if this course is to be pursued hereafter, I think we had better send a telegraphic dispatch to Washington to inform Congress that it cannot do so, as we will transact their business. I move, sir, to lay the proposition on the table.

Mr. MATHER called for the yeas and nays, but the requisite number of members not arising to second the call, they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the amendment upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend the article by adding the following additional section:

"That no person arrested or confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor, or be put to answer any criminal charge but by presentment or indictment."

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) on the table, and

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIT moved that the Convention adjourn, which motion was rejected.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to suspend the regular order of business, and take up for consideration article No. 20, but

The motion was rejected.

On motion of Mr. PRATHER,

The Convention adjourned until two o'clock,
P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the next general order, being a report from the committee on the legislative department.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT stated the general question to be on the first section of the report, which is as follows:

"The legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall be designated 'The General Assembly of the State of Indiana,' and shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives; and the enacting clause of every law shall be, 'Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana.'"

Mr. NAVE. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "Senate and" in the third line, so that it shall read—

"The legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall be designated 'The General Assembly of the State of Indiana,' and shall consist of a House of Representatives," &c.

In speeches that have been made in the Convention heretofore objection has been made to the number of Senators. For my part I see no good reason why we should retain the Senate at all, but that we should have a House of Representatives fresh from the people. With the restrictions that we propose to throw around the Legislature no evil could ever attend the action of the House of Representatives, as appears to be contemplated by some gentlemen, they being the immediate representatives of the people. Why, therefore, should we put the people to the additional expense of having a Senate; an irresponsible body, sitting in a different part of the Capitol, and elected, as some would suppose, for the purpose of looking over and controlling and regulating the action of the immediate representatives of the people—a body of men who hold their offices for four years, when the representatives of the people are only to hold their offices for two years? I ask the reason why we should continue this aristocratic body in the organic law of the State? a feature opposed in principle to our republican habits—a badge of tyranny borrowed from our mother country, Great Britain. There they have a House of Lords, men possessed of large fortunes, the adherents of the Crown, and who regard not the interests of the subject. It seems to me strange indeed that a nation should have resorted to a Revolution to rid themselves of tyranny, and continue to adhere to any of the features of that Government, which have for their object the concentration of power in the few, to guard over the people's representatives; aye, sir, over the people themselves. But we are told that a Senate is absolutely necessary in this State, to act as a check upon the representatives of the people, to prevent improvident and hasty legislation by them. Sir, has the Senate heretofore, in the legislation under the old Constitution, had the effect of preventing such legislation? If it has that would be an argument against my position; but the history of legislation in Indiana, since 1836 up to 1850, proves the fact that the Senate, in lieu of preventing improvident and hasty legislation, has aided in such legislation, and will continue to act in concert with the House of Representatives in all time to come, if the House and Senate are composed of one hundred and fifty members, although they may sit and act in separate bodies as heretofore; and the reason is this: that a majority of the Senators are elected from the same districts throughout the State that a majority of the members of the House are elected from, and have the same constituency, the same local and general interests to represent, and therefore certain interests have been promoted in different parts of the State to the prejudice of others more deserving, and those interests are all to be found in those counties having one Senator and from two to four Representatives. Sir, the time was once that on hearing the name of Senator uttered, we had associated with the word in the mind a man of learning, age, and experience; but what impression does it make on the mind of an individual at this period in the history of the world? Nothing more than this: that the individual has been successful in an electioneering contest, and therefore has succeeded to the office of Senator. You cannot say that he is a man of either learning, experience, or age, but is a Senator elect. I therefore am of the opinion that the people ought to have a direct representation, and through that immediate representation let them have laws passed for their government. That which is done by the representatives of the people sent immediately from them for that purpose, can never result to their injury. In all the States and the Colonies, at the several periods when the delegates have assembled together for the purpose of making their organic laws or Constitutions, those delegates have invariably met and transacted their business in one body. It must be apparent to all that the making of organic laws is of more importance to the people than the passage of statute laws, the former of which may remain in force for centuries, while the latter may be changed or repealed at pleasure. I therefore conclude that there is no necessity for a Senate in this State. But, sir, there is another reason. If you continue in office for four years a set of men called Senators, they do not know the immediate wishes of those whom they should represent. They remain so long in office that they forget the objects for which they were elected. They are not, therefore, in fact representatives of the people, but merely an aristocratic body, sitting in another part of the Capitol overlooking the people's immediate representatives. With these views I propose this amendment, and also for another reason, to which, for a moment, I will advert. It has been alleged here that one object of this Convention is to cheapen the administration of the government of the State. Why then not cheapen it by cutting off fifty men who perform no useful service, and who yet have a per diem allowance of three dollars per day? Why not dispense with this body and fix the number of Representatives at eighty? Why not dispense with a body which, in my opinion, is altogether unnecessary? Those who have heretofore had the honor of serving the people in the legislative Halls of the State will bear me out when I say that in consequence of measures having to pass through another and independent body, they have not been prepared and considered with that degree of care and attention which they would have received if our system had so ordered it, that they should be perfected in one representative body. If, then, you dispense with the Senate you will impose upon the remaining branch the duty of cautiously passing every thing they act upon; and in so doing I say again there cannot result any danger to the interests of the people. Sir, it appears to me to be preposterous in the science of government that we should continue two legislative bodies to act in separate capacities for no other purpose than that I can see than that of entailing a debt upon the State. With the view, therefore, of cheapening the administration of our government I propose this amendment, and am anxious that the same may prevail, thereby securing to the people a safe and wise government, whereby they may in the future govern themselves. But we hear objections to such a radical change in the organic law of the State; and who are the objectors? Are they to be found in the industrious and hard-working portion of the State? No, sir! Where do we find the objectors? They are to be found amongst that portion of our citizens called office-hunters. They all object, and why? Because they expect to live by office, at the expense of an unsuspecting people, and the greater the number of offices to fill the more men will thereby be accommodated. I have thought it due to myself and the country at large to say as much as I have said on this important subject, and much more might be said in support of the motion; but owing to the noise and confusion which prevails in this Hall, I will add nothing more.

Mr. WATTS. I have a small amendment, which perhaps the gentleman from Hendricks will add to his. If not I will offer it myself as an amendment to his amendment. It is, "and that the south end of the Capitol be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the public debt." [Laughter, "consent," and applause.]

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman from Hendricks accept of that amendment?

Mr. NAVE. No, sir.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to lay the amendment on the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend the section, by striking out the words "shall be designated the General Assembly of the State of Indiana," so that the section would read,

"The Legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives," &c.

The words which he moved to strike out were mere surplage and wholly unnecessary.

The question being taken on the amendment; it was adopted, and the section was then ordered by consent to be engrossed for a third reading.

NUMBER OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the second section of the report.

The section provides that the Senate shall consist of not less than one-third nor more than one-half of the members of the House; and the House of Representatives shall consist of not less than sixty nor more than seventy-five members, to be chosen by the qualified electors of their respective counties, or of the districts into which the State may from time to time be divided.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend the section by striking out the words "seventy-five," and inserting the words "one hundred." [Cries of "consent," "consent."]

Mr. SMITH of Scott, offered an amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out the words "sixty, nor more than seventy-five," and insert "one for each county, nor more than a hundred and twenty," and also to add the following proviso:

"Provided, That each county shall be represented by one member."

Mr. KELSO. I rise to a point of order. The point is that the amendment of the gentleman from Scott is not in order for the reason that it proposes to strike out a portion of the amendment that has not been acted upon by the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the gentleman from Scott is perfectly in order. Any gentleman has the same right to offer an amendment to an amendment, as to offer to amend the original section.

Mr. KELSO. I always give way when I am beaten; but I don't like to give way to men no better than I am.

Mr. SMITH of Scott. Mr. PRESIDENT, Inasmuch as I am placed here to represent the honorable constituency of the county of Scott,

I would be derelict in duty, if I did not raise my voice in opposition to the passage of such a section as will in the future deprive my people of their voice in the passage of laws by which they are to be governed. Now, sir, what is the question under consideration? Nothing less than a reduction of the present number of Senators and Representatives. My amendment proposes to fix in the new Constitution, the present members, with a proviso that each county in the State shall be entitled to one Representative. Is there anything unjust or unreasonable in this request? Every county in the State is a species of independency—a feeling of identity of interest pervades the feeling and interests of every individual in each county. It matters not how or what produces that feeling—it exists; and if the people are the sovereigns, if all power is inherent in them, if all “free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace and safety and happiness,” we as their servants, as their representatives, are bound to regard their will. Why then should not each county have an immediate representative—a man whose interest is identified with the interests of the people whom he represents—who residing among his constituents, feel as they feel, thinks as they think, and therefore truly reflects their will. How can a representative living in another, a remote county, understand the interest of a distant county. The people cannot anticipate every question which may arise in the Legislature, and therefore cannot instruct their representatives on some questions that may arise; therefore, every county should have an immediate representative, understanding their habits, manners, customs, feelings, and interests, to speak their voice in the Legislature.

But if two or more counties are united together, how can one man represent both counties upon any one question, unless, as is seldom the case, there should be a coincidence in all the interests under consideration? The strong can take care of themselves, the weak only need protection. If a large and small county are united together for representative purposes, the stronger will always rule, and all the interests of the smaller will be merged and lost in the greater, and the consequence will be that a large portion of the people will be dissatisfied with the enactment of laws in the passage of which they were either not heard at all, or misrepresented. If the larger counties yield to the smaller a representative, they gratify thereby all the selfishness of our nature, and exhibit a spirit of magnanimity worthy of their greatness, while on the other hand they lose nothing thereby, for they too have an immediate representative to represent their interests. If it is a fault to be weak, we of the small counties are not chargeable with our condition, for the Legislature without our consent, and with a perfect knowledge of the present state of things, has made us what we are, and the sin of the act is to be visited upon our heads as though we had created ourselves, if we are deprived of an immediate representative. But it is said that hereafter the Legislature will be permitted only to pass general laws. What harm then can arise by permitting each county to select a man to advise upon those general interests? If the representative represents only several interests, what danger can arise to the larger counties, if the smaller ones should elect an undue number of representatives? If each member of the Legislature is the representative of the whole State, as has been argued, what evils can arise by permitting unequal districts to select the representatives? We ask therefore that each and every organized county shall be permitted to have their will, their feelings, and their interests represented by a member to the Legislature selected by themselves, who may at all times reflect their will. But, sir, adopt the doctrine of some gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, that is, “the further the representative is removed from his constituents the better will be our laws”—I say adopt such a principle, by cutting down our representation, by making our senatorial and representative districts so large as to destroy the intimate relation and connection now existing between the representative and the people, and my candid opinion is that the people of our State will reject any Constitution you may present them, with such a provision. I therefore hope, that this Convention will give the amendment which I have just offered, that consideration which, in my judgment, it merits.

Mr. BADGER. Believing that this section as reported by the committee, reflects the will of the people of the State, and is just as it should be, I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. COLFAX called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. A division of the question being called for, the question will be first on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bright, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzañ, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mather, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—80.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cole, Conduit, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Kelso, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—46.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on aying the amendment of the gentleman from Dubois (Mr. Edmonston) on the table.

The yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Bourne, Brookbank, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kindley, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—63.

So the amendment, was laid upon the table.

MR. KELSO. I have an amendment which I now wish to offer to this section. It is to strike out the words, "not less than sixty nor more than seventy-five," and insert "one member from each organized county in the State." [Cries of "consent, consent, consent."] Sir, I have a word or two to say in regard to that amendment, and after that I think I shall be ready to vote upon any proposition that may be presented, without troubling the Convention any further. It seems to me, that upon this proposition we ought, as far as possible, to divest ourselves of everything like selfishness.

Now there are two legitimate modes on which to base a representation—either on population or on territory—the one or the other. Now, of the two, in the State of Indiana, I maintain that that of territory is the most proper. For that reason I have offered the amendment that the House of Representatives shall consist of one member from each organized county in the State. The most general interests of the community should be that which is most specially attended to in a basis of representation. No member of this Convention will deny that three-fifths, if not four-fifths of the population of Indiana are engaged in agricultural pursuits, and by governing our representation by the territory, by giving one representative, at least, to each county, we fully represent the agricultural interests of the State. If their interest be well protected I apprehend but little danger to the rest of the community, for the interest of every other pursuit is based upon the success of the agriculture of the country.

Now, sir, in amending the Constitution, we propose hereafter to dispense with all the special and local legislation that we can possibly dispense with; that the laws enacted by the Legislature, and by which the people are to be governed, shall be of as general a character as the circumstances of the case will possibly permit. Now if that be the case, I ask any delegate on this floor to answer me this question: what is the necessity of having more than one member from any county in the State? I say, sir, that the man who cannot represent every single question in the county of Wayne, one of the largest counties in the State, cannot represent the least. The man that cannot understand the several interests of that county, the largest in the State, both in point of wealth and population, cannot learn the interests of any county at all. One representative, I maintain, can attend to the several interests to be operated upon alone, by general provisions of law, for ten thousand men, just as well as he can for one thousand. And why then the necessity of having more than one representative from any one county, and why may not each county have one representative? Each county may have its separate interest to be attended to; and in the application of general laws, that interest should and ought to be entitled to a voice equal to one vote. Now all the advantage that can be derived from sending two or three members to represent a county, is the advantage of numbers when they come to vote.

Now, I contend that there ought to be one representative from each county. If we were going to continue the old mode of legislation, where every county had a law for itself, and every separate interest a law for itself, there would be great propriety then, in insisting upon numbers as large as possible in each county. But if we are to be hereafter governed by general laws, to operate upon all alike, I say that one representative from each county should have a separate voice in making the laws—the small counties as well as the large ones.

Sir, it is perhaps impossible to do strict and even-handed justice in this matter, and there are divers other questions to come before this Convention, in which strict justice cannot be meted out. It may be said in reply to my argument, that the large counties pay vastly more revenue than the smaller ones—such, for example as the county of Ohio, which, perhaps, is the smallest in the State, and that, therefore, the large counties ought to have a greater representation. But why ought this to be so? The large county, pays her money and contributes her funds to the general expenses of the government. And in return for what she pays in taxes, she has her large population, and her immense wealth protected. So does each county pay into the State treasury in proportion to her wealth; and all that she has back for it, is the same kind of protection to her population, her wealth, and her commerce. There is no necessity, sir, for giving any special advantages to the commercial interests of the State. They would be well enough secured by giving one representative to each county. It is charging the people with folly, to say that a county can be set up in opposition to a city within the limits of such county; for where the agricultural population does not prosper, no city can be built up. Then the county of Jefferson, or Floyd, or Marion, with their fine cities, would all be sufficiently well represented with one member in the Legislature. That representative can attend alike to the agricultural and the commercial interests of the county, and there is no danger of the commercial interest suffering, if the agricultural interest is well cared for.

I therefore maintain that the nearest we can come to strict justice, is to measure the population by the territory, and to give one representative to each county, be it great or small ("consent, consent"). There will be no danger hereafter, of an overwhelming increase in the House of Representatives—no danger of going beyond a reasonable number, for if it should be thought proper to increase the number of counties, we would only increase the representatives one for each additional county. But while that section in relation to the area of counties remains as it is, we are almost forbidden the idea of ever creating a new county in the State of Indiana.

Now it may be said that there are some eight or ten counties in the State that do not exceed a thousand votes in each. But let me say in reply to that, that there are not more than three or four of these counties but what have large territory and flattering prospects of a large increase of population. We should, therefore, look to the results which are most probable, and furnish them with a representation according to their circumstances. Although I admit that it will not be strictly even-handed justice, I maintain that it will come nearer to it than any other rule which can apply to the House of Representatives or the General Assembly of the State hereafter.

Now, sir, if I am driven to accept of population as a basis of representation—and I admit, that that is the rule most generally adopted in the United States—it is I know by the General Government, and, perhaps, by a large majority of the States of the Union—then I give notice that I will move for the number of sixty, and fixing the increase to meet the increase of population in the growing counties, so that that increase shall not be filled up by any sudden freak of the Legislature hereafter.

MR. FOSTER. I believe that this is an amendment to the original section under consideration. I therefore propose to strike it out and insert the following.

THE PRESIDENT. It is in order for the friends of the section to perfect it before any motion can be entertained to strike it out.

MR. FOSTER. I will barely remark, then, that I will read the section which I contemplate offering hereafter, as a substitute for this. If I have an opportunity of moving to strike out this section and moving to insert the first section of report No. 21, from the committee on the elective franchise, I will do so. This is one of the compromises by the committee on apportionment. We wished to have thirty Senators, and ninety members in the House of Representatives; but we made a compromise, and thought that we would have the representative branch as large as it now is, and reduce the Senate so as to give one senator to two representatives. These were the views that influenced us. I shall not go into the argument now; but I shall offer this section when the opportunity occurs, believing that it is the fairest that has been offered yet, and that the committee came to the same conclusion when they penned this section, and when it was reported to the Convention,

MR. LOCKHART. I do not favor either the section read by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) or the one now under consideration. I propose to strike out the section reported by the committee on the legislative department and to offer the following: "The Senate shall consist of fifty, and the House of Representatives of one hundred members." In the mean time I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) on the table.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered on this motion, they were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, and Mr. President—67.

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Crumacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Harbolt, Hall, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Kelso, Kendall of Warren, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—59.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

MR. LOCKHART. I now move to strike out the section, and insert the following:

"The Senate shall consist of fifty members, and the House of Representatives of one hundred, to be chosen by the qualified electors of the respective counties, or of the districts into which the State may from time to time be divided; and should any county or district be entitled to more than one representative, the General Assembly shall divide such county or representative district according to population without regard to territory."

MR. PEPPER of Crawford moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays being demanded and taken on the motion, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Logan, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—87.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cole, Crumacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Wheeler, Wiley, and Work—39.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

MR. SIMS moved to strike out all before the word "members," in the ninth line, and insert:

"The Senate shall consist of forty, and the House of Representatives of eighty members."

MR. PRATHER moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Mr. President—89.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Bourne, Bowers, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Dobson, Farrow, Foster, Gibson, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, March, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Sims, Smiley, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—38.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

MR. SPANN moved to amend the section by providing that the Senate consist of not exceeding fifty members, and the House of Representatives of not exceeding one hundred members, to be chosen by the qualified electors of the respective counties or districts into which the State may from time to time be divided.

Mr. RITCHEY. We have been voting very rapidly on amendment after amendment. There has been no discussion, and perhaps gentlemen do not want any; but I do wish to say to this Convention that I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jennings may prevail. Sir, this was one of the most exciting questions which was agitated in the county of Jefferson during the last campaign. Our opponent—for we had but one in that county, took ground decidedly in favor of a reduction of the members of the Legislature, and the question was as hotly canvassed as any other question, and I believe the decision was as decidedly against a reduction of the number of the members of the Legislature, as it was in favor of any other proposition submitted to them.

Sir, there are a great many small counties in the State of Indiana, and if you lessen the number of representatives, you give to the large counties almost the exclusive privilege of making laws for the State. As was remarked by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) many of the new counties are rapidly increasing in population; and it is unfair to say that the interests of those counties shall be smothered by the overwhelming interest which will be brought to bear upon them by the old counties of the State.

Sir, I hope the amendment will prevail; and if it were adopted I would go further and propose that after the first or second or third census after the new Constitution has been adopted—if it ever should be adopted—we should increase the number of representatives above one hundred. Sir, there is no propriety in limiting the representation of the people. It is the great interest of the State to have every portion of the State represented on this floor; and it is impossible with the number of counties we have that the people should ever be fairly represented with a less number than that proposed by the gentleman from Jennings. I hope the Convention will not consent to a less number than we have had for a number of years past—one hundred in the House and fifty in the Senate. I had an amendment which I was anxious to offer, which provides that the Senate shall not consist of less than half the number of representatives, and that the House of Representatives should at present be composed of one hundred members, and that there should afterwards be an increase of representation.

Sir, the idea that we should practice rigid economy is a very proper one; but to carry it to such an extent as to cripple the interests of the people is to be "penny wise and pound foolish." It is a penny wise economy which I hope never to see practiced.

I noticed in a paper yesterday that in New Hampshire they had authorized even their small townships having not more than one hundred and fifty voters to be represented in their representative Hall by sending a member there.

And why should not we allow our counties that consist of from 1200 to 2000 voters to be represented on this floor? Sir, if you reduce the number of representatives to what is proposed by the committee, and what would seem to be the wish of many members of this Convention, your counties which have two thousand voters would scarcely be entitled to send a representative here. And, sir, how large will your senatorial districts be under that arrangement? Why they will cover whole sections of the State; and I ask you if there are not interests in those sections as diverse as it is possible for interests to be? If the public debt were out of the way a tax of eight or ten cents on the hundred dollars would support a government with a hundred and fifty members in the House, and half that number in the Senate. I trust, then, that the Convention will not act hastily in regard to this reduction, and thus cripple the interests of the people, and prevent numerous counties in the State from having a voice in its counsels.

Mr. DOBSON. This is one of the most important questions that we shall have to consider this winter, and I am sorry to perceive that the Convention do not appear to be in a disposition suited to its calm and dispassionate consideration. This is no light question. A proposition has been introduced here for the purpose of doing away with a principle that has held good in our government ever since we had a government, and that was to dis sever the idea of taxation and representation. The proposition, it is true, was disposed of in a summary manner, showing that the members of this Convention were very little disposed to set aside one of the fundamental principles of all liberal governments. It was disposed of hastily; yet, as I think, rightly.

Now, what are we going to do? We are going to fix the number of Senators and Representatives for perhaps fifty years to come. Sir, under these circumstances, I go for the largest representation that can act without being too unwieldy, and not too expensive.

[A VOICE. "That's the doctrine."]

In a purely democratic government, all the people meet together for the purpose of making the law. In our country, however, owing to its great extent, they cannot do this; and hence they delegate their power to one whom they style their "representative," who goes to the seat of government, and gives utterance to the people's voice. Now, sir, I am of opinion that the people should be represented as fully as they are able to pay for. This matter of dollars and cents, in regard to a question of this kind, I hold to be one of the smallest considerations; and unless gentlemen wish that the large counties should swallow up all the small ones—as the rod of Moses when cast upon the ground, became a large snake, and swallowed all the smaller snakes of the Egyptian magi—I think they are wrong in seeking to practice too rigid economy in this department of government.

The State of Indiana has now been in existence for thirty-four years; and how has she progressed? Looking at what she has been, and at what she is now, I think we may safely judge of the future by the past, and predict a degree of prosperity in time to come, that will make her one of the greatest States of this confederacy. She has grown with amazing rapidity; and by way of taking a cool, dispassionate, and correct view of things, I would call the attention of gentlemen to a few figures, exhibiting her progress as it is actually on record. In the year 1800, there were in the territory, only 4,875 persons, principally French inhabitants at Vincennes, and a few families in Clark's Grant. There were at that time—only fifty years ago—but 280,000 persons west of the Allegheny mountains, and not even a waggon road across them.

| Year. | Population. | Polls.* | Value of property. |
| 1800  | 4,875       |         |                    |

†Before the year 1835, we had a specific tax, therefore the total value of property cannot be ascertained.

In 1836, we had only 5,000,000 acres of land taxable—in 1850, we have upwards of 15,000,000. By a law of Congress, passed in 1847, we can tax all lands sold by the United States, which will cause about 2,000,000 more to pay tax, whenever the Legislature may think proper to tax them, which will make above 17,000,000 of acres of land subject to taxation. There is 23,360,000 acres in the State, all of which will, in the course of time, become productive and taxable.

Now, as to the revenue, it has increased in the same proportion, and so has the amount of taxable property. In fifteen years, we have more than trebled our wealth, and doubled our population; and yet it seems that we are prepared here to say, that a less number of representatives shall transact the business of the people, in twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty years from now, than we have at the present time. Sir, this is a retrograde movement. It is wrong. The Legislature is the popular branch of the government, and ought to be as full as the people desire that it should be. It is their duty, to make, to alter, or amend the laws by which the people are to be governed, and to attend to their business in every particular; for it is through the Legislature that the people speak.

Now, Mr. President, we have said that the people, through the Legislature, should only speak once in two years. That, sir, is a backward step, in my estimation, though a great many of the people appear to be in favor of it. I voted for it in accordance with their wishes. I believe that the public voice should be in constant readiness to speak, at any and every moment, when an exigency may require it. [A VOICE. "So it is, for the Governor has the power to convene the Legislature at any time."]

But, sir, it is the duty of the Legislature to assess the taxes requisite for the support of the government. Now I want gentlemen to remember that taxation and representation should be equal; that I, living in a county with five hundred inhabitants, should not have an equal voice in assessing a tax, with the county of Wayne, with four thousand and five hundred of a population. It would be unequal, and unfair, that I should have the same power of assessing taxes that they have. If they have four voices at home, and I only one, they should have four voices to my one in the assessment of taxes. Now, it is the business of the Legislature to assess the taxes, and to perform various other duties. It is true that we have reduced their duties to a considerable extent. Under the Constitution of the United States, it is their duty to elect a United States Senator, and, in the performance of that very important duty, the principle of electing one member of the House of Representatives from each county would work most injuriously—for the people would not then be represented on the broad principles of republicanism, but the only representation would be of the territory. Then the county of Benton, with only two hundred voters, would have as much voice in the election of a United States Senator, as the county of Wayne, or any other county in the State. That would be wrong; for, in that case, taxation and representation would no longer be equal, and that is a principle which ought never to be lost sight of.

Again: it is the duty of the Legislature to impeach the Governor of the State, if necessary, and that should be done only by a Legislature representing the people, and not a Legislature merely representing territory. It is their business, too, to guard and protect the revenues of the country; and as the revenue is usually in proportion to population—for there would be no revenue without it—it is but fair that those who have the largest amount of revenue to pay, should have the largest voice in the assessment.

Another thing, sir, it is not bad policy for the people of the various parts of the State to meet frequently together by their representatives, in order to instruct and be instructed in those matters which appertain to the interests of every section, so that such laws may be framed as will conduce to the good of the whole population of the State.

Now, I believe these to be the feelings of the people of the country. There are now ninety counties in the State, of which the counties that I represent, are over average counties, in point of population, and one of them a little over the average in point of wealth; and I believe that the county of Owen or Green, would never be content without one representative each. Mr. President, whenever the people in the smaller counties become too poor, either from mental or physical causes, to take care of themselves, it is time enough to appoint guardians over them; but, sir, not till then. I take it that the people have a right to be heard in the Legislative halls of the State, if they pay for it, and I believe that every average county in the State would be willing to pay for it.

Now, so far as the Senate is concerned, I would not care so much to have it reduced; still I shall oppose it. Many of the people are anxious to have it reduced, and it is perhaps necessary, whether their numbers be reduced or not, that they should be a little reduced in their dignity. [A laugh.]

Another thing: Our people have all the time an interest at the seat of government. They have a large interest here. They send to the seat of government over half a million of dollars annually, which is assessed and collected by the Legislature; and when we have double the population which we have now, which I suppose we will have before very long, it will amount to a million; and you may depend upon it that that time will come before this Constitution is altered or amended. The people have various other interests, and they want to come here to do various business. The people of each county would doubtless be willing to bear the expense of having a member here, not only to transact the duties of a legislator, as already mentioned, but it would even be a part of the consideration that an individual—no matter what his calling may be—who has business at the seat of government can find some one he is acquainted with when he reaches here, and who he knows will see that his rights are secured. He feels as if he were coming to his own house, and not to the house of the stranger.

I hope, then, that the Convention will provide for not less than a hundred members, to be selected from districts in regard to population, and not in regard to wealth, or territory, or anything else—but solely in regard to men. And I would provide that after the year 1870, they might be increased to 120. Sir, I hold that if the people cannot act through their representatives they can act in no way whatever. These are my views about the matter, and I hope that the Convention will consider the question calmly and dispassionately, both for our own and the public good.

Mr. READ of Clark. The gentleman says that we should make some compromise. My opinion is, that the public sentiment requires that a reduction should be made in the number of the members of the Senate. Our Senate is larger than any Senate in the United States. Let us reduce them to thirty, and say a hundred in the House of Representatives. I, for one, am willing to vote for that number.

Mr. FOLEY. I move to amend the amendment by providing that the Senate shall consist of not more than thirty, and the House of Representatives of not more than seventy members. I think that we have a fair test before us of the value of such a proposition. It must be evident to every gentleman here, that if we had but seventy members on this floor we would proceed with business much faster than we do now. I do not consider that the interest of the country requires that there should be a member from every county. I thoroughly believe that a small number of men will do business with more dispatch and accuracy than a large number; and for that reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. HADDON. I am not going to make a speech on this question, but have merely risen to move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table, with the view of offering another amendment to the section, which is, that the Senate shall consist of thirty members and the House of Representatives of one hundred.

After some conversation between Mr. Kelso and Mr. Haddon, the latter gentleman withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RITCHEY. As it is so difficult a matter to agree upon the number of Senators and Representatives, I do hope that gentlemen will not pile amendments upon amendments, but let us take a vote on each distinct proposition. I think we could get along better than we are doing by laying so many amendments upon the top of each other.

Mr. FOSTER. I would remark to the gentleman from Allen that the committee on apportionment were just waiting for the very thing the Convention is now doing. The committee would have decided upon the matter long ago in regard to the general proposition, only that they were waiting for the Convention to fix the number of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. President, is not this a motion to strike out the whole section?

Mr. PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. COLFAX. Is it not in order first to perfect the section?

Mr. PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. COLFAX. Then I move to strike out the first three lines of the section and insert:

"The Senate shall consist of thirty members and the House of Representatives of one hundred."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I should like to say a few words on this subject, and I shall be very brief. I have not spoken yet upon this question.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "To-morrow, to-morrow," and "adjourn, adjourn."

Pending the question on the amendment of Mr. Colfax—

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, DEC. 6, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LONG.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HOGIN presented a petition from citizens of Grant county, in reference to the rights of colored persons.

The petition was read and referred to the select committee on that subject.

There being no reports from committees,

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

The first thing in order being the third, fourth, fifth, and seventh sections of report No. 11, being a report from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention take the vote upon these sections collectively or separately?

SEVERAL VOICES. "Severally."

The PRESIDENT put the question, Shall the vote upon these sections be taken separately? And it was decided in the negative.

The sections were then read by the Secretary.

The third section provides that no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit, &c.

The fourth declares that all elections shall be free and equal.

The fifth prohibits a suspension of the laws except by authority of the Legislature.

The sixth has reference to the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable search or seizure, &c.

The seventh relates to the right of the people to instruct their representatives, and to petition for redress of grievances.

The question being shall the sections pass,

The yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and resulted—yeas 120, nays 1—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—120.

NAYS.—Mr. Pettit—1.

So the sections were passed.

The first section of report No. 12, being the report from the committee on the legislative department, was then taken up on its third reading. It was read, as follows:

SEC. —. The Legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall be designated "The General Assembly of the State of Indiana," and shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, and the enacting clause of every law shall be: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana."

The question then being, Shall the section pass?

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to dispense with the call of the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the final passage of the section, and the yeas and nays are required to be taken by a rule of the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. I can see no necessity for taking the yeas and nays on every section. I move that the rules be suspended. [Cries of "no, no."] Very well, let the vote be taken.

The yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 124, nays none:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather,

May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—124.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention, a communication from the Secretary of the Convention, accompanied by a report made by a committee of the Ohio Constitutional Convention on the subject of apportionment of representatives.

The communication and the report having been read,

Mr. COOKERLY moved that they be laid on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. It is no more than proper that this document should be referred to the committee on the legislative department.

SEVERAL DELEGATES. "Let it be referred to the committee on apportionment."

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Vigo, to lay the communication on the table, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. PETTIT. I move now that the report be referred to the committee on the Legislative department.

VOICES. "Committee on apportionment."

Mr. PETTIT. Very well, the committee on apportionment, then.

The question being taken the motion was agreed to, and the communication was accordingly referred to the committee on the apportionment of representation.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the section that was pending at the time of the adjournment yesterday, namely: the section which provides that the Senate shall consist of not less than one-third, or more than one-half of the number of members of the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives shall consist of not less than sixty, nor more than seventy-five members.

The question being on the amendment moved by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) so as to provide that the Senate shall consist of thirty, and the House of Representatives of one hundred, members—

Mr. DOBSON moved to amend the amendment by striking out thirty and inserting fifty, so as to make the Senate consist of fifty members.

Mr. DOBSON. I have a word to say, sir, about this matter. I feel some anxiety about it, and I wish simply to make a statement in regard to it. I am not disposed to place the entire control of the State of Indiana in the hands of thirty men.

Mr. MOWRER (addressing the President). I believe, sir, the gentleman from Owen has made one speech already upon this subject.

Mr. DOBSON. Not upon this question, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I will remark that I was entitled to the floor, having moved the adjournment yesterday, but I concluded as the Convention appeared to be in a good humor, that they would proceed to vote; I therefore declined availing myself of my privilege.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Owen is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOBSON. I will inform gentlemen that I have been in legislative bodies a number of years, and am not often out of order.

I wish, sir, to say this, that by reducing the Senate to so small a number you are placing it in the power of a few commercial points in this State to govern the Legislature. I am opposed to it; not because it will benefit the commercial portion of the State, for I do not come here to raise a prejudice against any avocation that men may be engaged in, but because I think it will have an injurious tendency upon the interests of the State generally. Now let us see how this thing will work. If we have only thirty Senators—and I call on gentlemen who represent the small counties to look to this thing seriously—where will they be elected. And it must be recollected that this is to operate for a long time. Laporte county and Michigan City will have one Senator. St. Joseph will have another. There are two from the confines of the State. Fort Wayne will have one; Logansport and Lafayette each one; Terre Haute, Vincennes, and Evansville will each have one. New Albany will have one. As to Jeffersonville I do not know; it is doubtful whether there will be one from Jeffersonville.

Mr. PRATHER. No, sir, I think not.

Mr. DOBSON. Madison will have one, no doubt, and old Wayne will have one.

Mr. RARIDEN. Yes, sir, two.

Mr. DOBSON. Connersville will have one. She is never behind. She has furnished as many of the distinguished men for Indiana as North Carolina has furnished to the national councils. Now how many have we got already? There are twelve, and yet Indianapolis is not provided for. She will have one undoubtedly. Now we come into the interior. Indianapolis and Greencastle, fifteen—half of your Senate. Now between Indianapolis and Madison there must be one, which will make a majority—they will pass such laws as suits their own interests and rejecting such as you may wish to protect your interests after they have been passed by the House.

They will control all the interests of the State in one branch of the Legislature.

I know it is the fashion to talk about the popular branch of the Legislature being of the most importance—about their vigilance, and faithfulness, and patriotism, but there will be a corresponding number in the House of Representatives ready to sustain the same policy. So the commercial interest of the State will control one branch of the Legislature positively and the other negatively. I hope that gentlemen will consider seriously of this matter—that they will consider that we are going to have, in all probability, three banks in this State. They will of course be located at the commercial points, for they will be conducted, not by men who are the producers of wealth, who enrich the State by their labor, but by those who wish to live by other means than labor. They will be located at these commercial points. Your savings institutions will be there, your insurance offices, your railroad directors' offices, &c., &c. This will be the location for your banks, and the residence of your moneyed men generally. I do not use this language for the purpose of creating a prejudice against those commercial places. I am willing that they should have a voice in the government as well as other parts of the State. But I am not willing that they should have more than their due share of power and influence in the Legislature.

I hope the proposition will be so amended as to compromise this matter, and that it will be adopted, and to enable us to see who are its supporters and who are its opponents, I wish to call the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The remarks that I am about to make, sir, will be directed more immediately to the amendment proposed by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that that amendment is not now under consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. But, sir, the subject of this debate has an immediate connection with it.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the question before the Convention.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, sir, I am opposed to this amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted. I hope that the section will not be stricken out for the reason that the amendment that is proposed, placed us back in the same situation which we occupy under the old Constitution in point of numbers, that is, it gives us one hundred Representatives and fifty Senators. I believe that such a provision is unnecessary, and I hope it will not be adopted for the reason that if it fails the amendment offered by my colleague will then come up for the action of the Convention; and as the amendment of my colleague embraces, as I believe, the wishes of our constituents, I feel bound to give it my support.

I listened patiently during the discussion of yesterday, as I do to every discussion that takes place on this floor. And I listened to it with pleasure because I believe nothing is lost by discussion. I am not one of those who believe that debate ought to be stifled. I have not heard a speech made on this floor by any gentleman from which I have not been able to gather something at least to assist me in coming to a conclusion in regard to the correctness of matters on which I have to record my vote.

My friend from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) is in favor of the amendment as it now stands, on the ground that it will procure equal representation, by giving each county a representative. He thinks, that, unless each county in the State has a representative of its own, coming immediately from the bounds of their own immediate county, we could not anticipate or expect to have a fair representation. Now, if I believed that to be true—if I thought it to be true in practice—I am the last man that would go, for a moment, to take from the people the right to a full and clear representation of their rights in the legislative halls of this State. But, sir, when we look over the history of legislation, what do we find? I may be permitted to refer to a case of this kind, as an illustration of my views on that point. We are now represented in Congress by districts, as we shall have to be represented here, if the amendment of my colleague prevails. For I understand, that, if we reduce the number of representatives and senators, as proposed in his amendment, and according to the principle contained in the amendment, we shall be obliged to resort to districting the State. Now let me say that the Congressional district in which I live is composed of seven counties. It has been represented by my friend from Ripley, on my left, for several years. Divided as we have been in politics, I have never supported him; but I have not yet learned that any county in that district which he represented had any cause of complaint against his course in Congress, so far, at least, as partiality is concerned. If, then, a representative in Congress can represent seven counties and do them justice, and give entire satisfaction, will any gentleman tell me why it is—can any one assign a good reason, unless it grow out of selfish feelings—why one representative in the State Legislature may not do ample justice to as many counties as it would be necessary to include in one district. It might operate harshly upon the new counties for the time being; but at no distant day, if the population continues to increase as it has heretofore done, those counties will be so densely populated that they will be equal to the old counties. I think there is but one true rule of representation, and that is, that representation and taxation should go hand in hand; they have always been connected.

One word in regard to the policy and propriety of the measure. Sir, it is a question well settled in political economy, that we should economize in legislation as much as in any other business. It is a point well settled, that, when you can accomplish the same ends with less expense, it is right to do so. It was correctly remarked yesterday by my colleague, when he offered his amendment, that we had proof in this Hall that a smaller number would do more business and do it better; and we have an exemplification on this floor of the truth of the assertions which he then made, and of the utility and correct principle contained in the amendment; and when I say this I do not speak with disrespect towards other gentlemen on this floor. I do not believe there is any gentleman here who has spoken at any time except when he ought to have spoken. There are high duties devolving upon us; and, sir, I do not believe that many speeches have been made out of place. But, sir, owing to the numbers composing this body, our session must be long and tedious; and I venture the assertion, that there is not a gentleman on this floor who will not concede the fact, that, if this body was composed of but fifty members, we should get through with the business sooner, and perhaps not more than one-third the expense—do it with more accuracy—with more harmony existing among the members of the Convention! And, sir, if you go to the Legislature, the same rule will hold good. It is not solely on account of the expense, however, that I go for the amendment reducing the number; but the first question is: Can we, if we adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Decatur, instead of the amendment now under consideration, accomplish anything more than if we allow the number of representatives to continue as it is? I suppose there is no gentleman who doubts that the two branches of the General Assembly, one composed of seventy-five members, and the other of twenty-five, will not embody in themselves sufficient talent to legislate in the best possible manner for the interests of the people of the State—that they will be able to legislate as well as if the General Assembly were composed of one hundred and fifty members. I think there can be no doubt about it. And it is very certain that they can do the business more quickly. Instead of having a session of nine weeks, they will be able to transact the business in six weeks; and it will be done at perhaps one-half of the expense that it now costs. And with equal success, it occurs to me, that there can be no question that a representative, coming from two counties, or representing a number of counties, as they did in the early history of this State, can and will be able to represent those counties as faithfully and as much to their advantage, as if each member represented but one county. And, sir, let me here say, that the reduction of the number of members of the General Assembly will be a measure of economy in two points of view: it will be a saving of time and a saving of money; and, in my opinion, produce better legislation—more sound and wholesome laws for the people.

It seems to me, therefore, that the proposed reduction should be made. I believe that it is in accordance with the wishes of the people that the reduction should be made. I hope that the amendment now pending will be adopted, and that we shall not go back to that system which has, in times gone by, been productive of much evil. I hope that we shall adopt a system that will secure the rights that the people want, and secure it at half the present cost. It will be economy in a pecuniary sense, and at the same time it will furnish the people with a Legislature sound and wholesome, and provide them with laws for their government that will do them ample justice.

Sir, I am well aware that much has been said on this question, that the Convention is becoming impatient and anxious to close the discussion. But, sir, I will add that if this Convention, as I believe it will do, provides means to guard against so much local legislation in future, in so doing they will remove from the Halls of legislation all the difficulties growing out of local interests, and only leave for the action of the Legislature, matters of a general nature, affecting the public at large and which may safely be trusted in the hands of representatives coming from a district composed of two more counties.

Sir, reduce the number of Senators and Representatives as proposed by my colleague, provide some means by which we can get rid of local legislation, and leave your legislators to act on general subjects, then, sir, you may safely reduce the number, effect a saving to the people, and at the same time guard and protect their rights. Then, sir, you may adopt the wholesome reform proposed by the gentleman from Decatur. In conclusion, sir, I will say that the people want safe, prudent, and proper legislation, on the most economical and saving terms. Give them this, and with it you will find them pleased and content.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. This, sir, is not only a question of much importance to this body, but it is a question which affects the whole body politic of Indiana. For every county, large or small, has a direct interest in this question. So far as my own feelings are concerned, I should prefer that the whole matter be left to the Legislature to be adjusted from time to time, as the wants of the people indicated. But I am satisfied that this Convention will not agree with me in this matter, and that they will fix the representation of the State for the future; at least, they will fix the maximum of representatives for the future; believing this, sir, and representing a county that may be considered under the medium size, gentlemen may readily anticipate the position I shall take upon this subject.

It shall be my purpose to secure the greatest possible advantage to small counties, without at the same time, trampling upon the rights of the large counties.

The legislator should labor to bring the representative principle as near to the people as possible, giving a fair and full expression of opinion, on all public matters, so that every county could feel that it had a direct voice in the law-making power. The principle that representation should be based upon population, upon numbers, is in the main correct.

Territory, alone, should not be represented; but, sir, you might, with great propriety, blend territory and population together without sacrificing any wholesome principle of government.

Whenever the Legislature conceives it of sufficient importance to lay out and organize a new county, there can be no good reason why that county, after its organization, should not be entitled to a representation in the General Assembly. It is doubtless upon this principle, that the Constitution of the United States gives to every State, however small, two Senators—that she may feel that in one branch of our national councils she has a voice equal to the largest State in the Confederacy.

Under the present order of things, the larger counties have the advantage over the small ones, making population alone the basis of representation.

I am aware, sir, that it is very difficult to perfect an apportionment law to suit all; the large counties hold the power in their own hands, and generally use it so as to get the best of the bargain. I do not particularly complain of this, as the representative considers it his duty to procure the best bargain he can for his constituents; and the small counties would undoubtedly do the same thing if they had the power.

Hence, Mr. President, arises the necessity for this Convention, in revising a Constitution, not only for the present, but perhaps for the next century, to defend the weak against the strong.

As every man is bound to contribute to the support of his government in proportion to his means, so should the laws alike in all things protect his rights; and the right to a just and equal representation is paramount to all others. He pays for the enjoyment of this privilege more cheerfully than for any other; it elevates the mind and develops the better feelings of his nature.

While we are, Mr. President, engaged in adjusting this matter, we should fix the basis of representation upon the most equitable terms, and place it beyond the power of partisan Legislatures or selfish politicians to change, and in the appropriate words of the poet, I would say to every gentleman—

"Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's, thy God's, and Truth's."

I am opposed to increasing the aggregate number of Senators and Representatives beyond the present limit, leaving the number subject to be reduced, if it should be thought expedient; and from the feeling prevalent in this Convention, we may safely infer that a majority will decide the question accordingly. But, while the whole number of Senators and Representatives is kept up to one hundred and fifty, in order that small counties may be accommodated as far as possible with a representative in the popular branch of the Legislature, I am in favor of increasing the House to one hundred and eighteen, and reducing the Senate to thirty-two. There would then be one hundred and fifty, in all, as at present, and the bodies quite as well proportioned as they now are. Most of the New England States have small Senates, even smaller than the number I propose; while the number composing the popular branch is large. No where is legislation performed with less expense, with more dispatch—and no where are law and order more sacredly observed than in that land known for steady habits.

I shall also favor the single district system. With single districts, men of merit and intelligence, farmers and mechanics, who are well known in the counties where they reside, but are not known abroad, will stand a much better chance to be elected to office.

But, sir, make your districts large, composed of two or more counties, where no necessity of this kind exists, and the men who make politics a trade and devote their whole time and energies in seeking office and stirring up political or sectional strifes, will, in a vast majority of cases, fill the most important offices. This is a matter of considerable importance, and should be duly considered by this Convention.

Mr. NILES. I should not have risen to make a single remark but for the allusion by the gentleman from Owen, to the county of Laporte. It is true, sir, as suggested by him, that that is to be one of the wealthiest and most commercial counties in the State, and whatever ratio of representation may be determined upon, we can never be without an immediate representative in the General Assembly. But I can speak safely not only for myself but for every individual whom I in part represent, when I say that we have no local, sectional, or party schemes to subvert in this Hall. I stand ready to aid in incorporating into the Constitution, any wholesome measures of reform, but I am equally ready to oppose whatever tends to extremes one way or the other. And I believe that the section now under consideration proposing to reduce the number of members of the General Assembly, in the aggregate of both Houses, below one hundred and fifty, to be one of these extremes. By this section we should probably have the smallest legislative body in the world. I would not by any means increase either House to a burthen-some or unwieldy number, but I would make the number sufficient that all parts of the State and even local interests and feelings should be represented—that if possible every citizen of the State should have some personal acquaintance in the General Assembly with whom he could confer. I would bring the Legislature as near to the people as practicable. It seems to me that a reasonable provision on the subject would be not more than one hundred for the House, and not exceeding fifty for the Senate, as they are at present constituted. Even if we leave the question open within those numbers, I have no idea that they will ever be reduced.

But it is said that a Senate of fifty members is too large. I look upon a Senate as performing the same uses precisely as a House of Representatives, not as a peculiarly conservative body representing aristocracy or wealth, but simply as a co-ordinate branch, operating as a check upon hasty legislation—not at all as analogous to the House of Lords in Great Britain, but merely as another House of Commons—the Senate and House being so arranged that each must review the action of the other, and aid in wholesome Legislation by its wisdom and councils. What serious objection then to permitting the Senate to consist of not more than fifty members? If a House of seventy members, as proposed by the committee, can progress with business, surely a Senate can with fifty. Experience may prove the wisdom of ultimately reducing the number of the Senate; but I see nothing indicating the propriety of doing it now. But it is said that a small body could dispatch business more rapidly and with less debate than a larger one. Now, sir, I have no such horror of the idea of my representatives earnestly debating any important question and freely interchanging opinions before they act upon it, as seems to possess certain gentlemen. But I do not believe that by diminishing numbers, you check the freedom of speech or debate. The Senate of the United States is, if possible, a more talkative body than the House of Representatives. Neither by diminishing the numbers below what they are at present will you secure more discriminating or judicious action. There is no body in which legislation is conducted with more care than in the British House of Commons, consisting of five or six hundred members.

A main argument in favor of the reduction is the saving of expense. Now, sir, I hold to all reasonable economy in the public expenditures as strenuously as any other man. But while listening to the remarks of gentlemen this morning upon this subject, I have made a calculation, reducing to dollars and cents the amount of the proposed saving—if, indeed, the word dollar can properly be used. In ten years from this time our population will probably reach a million and an half. At fifty in the Senate and an hundred in the House, each Senator will then represent thirty thousand people. Suppose a session to last sixty days, and the mileage and per diem to amount to two hundred dollars for each Senator, how much do you think he would cost every one of his constituents? Why, sir, two-thirds of one cent. [A laugh.] And a Representative would cost his constituents twice as much—all this to be paid once in two years. But if, instead of counting the entire expense you only estimate the saving to each inhabitant by the proposed reduction, it comes down to a fraction so low that you may need to consult your arithmetics to find a fraction small enough to express it. Shall such a pitiful saving as this be made a hobby and be urged as a reason for reducing the Senate to an oligarchy, and removing the Legislature further from the people? I trust not.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I have heretofore expressed my views on the propriety of reducing the number of members of both branches of the General Assembly, and have nothing further to say on that subject at the present time. If, however, we must have an aggregate number of one hundred and fifty members in the two Houses, the ratio between them, it appears to me, ought to be different from the one that now exists, and which the amendment under consideration provides shall be continued. Instead of the Senate consisting of half the number of members of the House of Representatives, it ought not, in my opinion, to consist of more than one-third of that number. By an examination of the Senatorial districts, as at present organized, it will be seen that twenty-five—the one-half—of those districts consist respectively of but one county. These twenty-five Senators as fully represent the local interests of their respective counties as their corresponding Representatives in the lower House. And in view of this fact, what difference is there in effect between the Senate and the House of Representatives, and how does the Senate operate as a wholesome check upon the action of the other House? But if we reduce the number of Senators, and enlarge their districts, so that no Senator may have the same constituency as any member of the lower House, we will give to the Senate a more conservative character than it can possibly have according to the present ratio. If a Senator's district consists of two or more counties, instead of consulting the interests of a single county, his duty will compel him to endeavor to subserve impartially the interests of all the counties in his district.

I must beg leave to allude briefly to an argument used by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) against the reduction of the Senate. He has directed the attention of the Convention to the influence which certain cities in this State will have in the Senate if the number of Senators is reduced. Now, sir, I trust that this Convention will sanction no mode of apportionment that is not based upon population, and that will not give to every voter in Indiana, whether he lives in a city or in the country, an equal voice and influence in the legislation of the State. The people must be represented in your Legislature, and not territory, and no man's rights must be subject either to increase or diminution by the circumstance of his place of residence. If, then, the localities referred to by the gentleman, contain a majority of the voters of the State, they have a right to control the legislation of the State, and there must be no discriminations against them to deprive them of that right. That gentleman has endeavored to produce the impression that the interests of the cities conflict with the interests of the agricultural portions of the State. He could not have fallen into a greater error. Our towns and cities are entirely dependent for their growth and prosperity upon the country, and their interests cannot be more directly advanced than by promoting the great agricultural interests of the State. That gentleman also seems to think that the influence of the cities will be exerted to maintain our banks and increase our banking facilities. Undoubtedly it will. But let me say to that gentleman, that no class of our citizens are so deeply interested in maintaining our banks and increasing our banking facilities, so far as the same can be done with safety, as the farmers, and that if he were this day to strike down all these facilities, the first and the loudest complaints he would hear for this loss would be from the farmers. They would feel the loss at once in the price of their produce. Traders might find employment in other pursuits, but the farmer must depend upon the products of the soil for the increase of his comfort and prosperity. If you deprive the traders engaged in the purchase of hogs, corn, wheat, and all the other products of the soil, of the means of procuring loans for the purchase of those articles, which loans they may pay by the sale of the same articles, you drive from the market a large proportion of the purchasers, and redeem in the same ratio the prices of the surplus products of the farmer. I know the question of banking does not properly belong to the subject under consideration, but it was brought into the discussion by the gentleman from Owen, and I have thought it necessary to say this much in reply to his remarks. I always regret, under any circumstances, to hear remarks that tend to excite the prejudices of the people of the country against our towns and cities. We are one people, and our interests are the same wherever we may live; and on the important question of the apportionment of senators and representatives we should not permit ourselves to be influenced by any jealousies or selfish purposes.

Mr. KELSO. I wish to submit a few remarks on this question for the consideration of the Convention, without attempting to take sides particularly with either one or the other of the two parties that appear to have been raised in regard to it—hoping that something may grow out of what is said amongst us that will lead to a compromise and a united vote on the question.

If, sir, we are to be governed by population, as the basis of representation, as remarked by the gentleman last upon the floor, (Mr. Dunn of Jefferson,) then I maintain it is our duty not only to provide suitable representation for the present amount of population in Indiana, but to look forward to the future, and make some provision for those who are to come after us, bearing in mind the increase of population. In that view of the case evidently, we ought to commence with the smallest possible number that would answer the purpose of representation at present, leaving with the Legislature the power to increase the representation as the population may increase hereafter in the State.

But, sir, as I regard each county of the State as a kind of independent corporate community, it seems to me it is no more than proper that each county should have a representative. If, then, it is agreed that each county shall have a representative, we must make the popular branch of the Legislature so much the larger, in order to give to each county a representative, or as nearly so as possible. Regarding the Senate as a mere conservative body—only created for the purpose of affording a wholesome check upon the popular branch of the Legislature, and perhaps upon the Executive—who, in return, hold a species of check upon both branches—it seems to me that that body should be decreased to the very smallest number adequate to the performance of the necessary duties involved, and that, too, with much greater propriety than to decrease the popular branch. I ask, then, would it not be better policy to commence with a Senate of say thirty-three, and a House of Representatives of one hundred members—with the power to increase the number, given to the Legislature—the limit being fixed at fifty members in the Senate and one hundred and twenty members in the House. If we can agree upon a compromise of this description, there will be nearly a representative to each county, with the exception of some two or three counties, and there will be some five or six, or perhaps ten counties, having two Representatives. I believe, sir, we ought to make this kind of a compromise, and that we ought to fix the rule of representation in the lower branch of the Legislature, so as nearly as possible to give one representative to each county. There are about ninety counties in the State, and the surplus of ten or more members can be apportioned among the larger and more populous counties. Then we can arrange the Senators in just proportion to the population.

I maintain, sir, that one Senator can represent, with propriety, two, three, four, and even five counties. Each Senator, sir, is a kind of conservative to operate upon the action of two, three, and four Representatives, as a kind of wholesome check to hasty and inconsiderate legislation. I am opposed to fixing the number of Representatives at one hundred, and the number of Senators, at fifty; because, if we do fix it at that ratio, we do not allow for the increase of population in future, for I contend that the representation should be apportioned with a view to the increase of population. As the increase of population in this State will probably be at the rate of ten thousand persons per year, at the end of the next twenty years the proper number of Representatives would be one hundred and twenty in the House, and sixty in the Senate; this, of course, would be more than we would want. It would make both branches larger than it would be desirable to have them. Provided we shall make the number of Representatives one hundred, and Senators fifty at this time, this apportionment is to last during the life of the Constitution we are framing. Would this be acting fairly to those who are to come after us? It would not be fair, sir, that a million of people in Indiana, now, should have the same representation that perhaps a million and a half of people, or two, or three millions would have, thirty or forty years hence.

MR. DOBSON. After we get through with apportioning our representation, we can attend to that.

MR. KELSO. Why not make the matter right at once? Do what we do right now, and once doing will be sufficient.

The gentleman from Owen, sir, seems to have an idea that it is the dollars and cents in the State that we are going to represent. Now, sir, that is a doctrine I cannot subscribe to.

MR. DOBSON. The gentleman from Switzerland has misunderstood me. It is the people, and not dollars and cents, I desire to have represented.

MR. KELSO. Well, sir, I understood the gentleman yesterday, to argue that wealth and not the people were to be represented. Now for his tar-bucket speech to-day.—He has contended, sir, that the people in the county of Owen did not like to be made tar-buckets of. If, by that remark, he alluded to the people who came from North Carolina and settled in his county, I can only say that it is manifest that they came from a very tarry country. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Owen has located a list of districts, from which he thinks Senators will be elected, who will control the action of the Legislature. Now, sir, there is a necessity existing for about thirty Senators, and no more; and those Senators will be elected wherever the people choose to elect them. I do not admit the truth of his assertion, sir, that the commercial interests of the community will seek to act injuriously towards the agricultural interests of the State. I assert that the agricultural portion of the people of Indiana, are as wide awake to their interests, and as competent to attend to them as the commercial part of the community are able to attend to their interests. They will attend to their interests as readily, as certainly, and as effectually. There is no danger, sir, by making Senatorial districts of two, three, or four counties in the State, of Senators being elected for those districts from among the commercial classes, representing, perhaps, banking interest. They will be elected from the country as readily as from cities. The fact is, sir, men who are disconnected with banks, will be elected more readily by the people, than those who are—or who are themselves bankers.

The gentleman further says, that we will be more liable to have men representing the monied portion of the State, because of the free system of banking. Sir, I say God forbid that we should adopt that system, for if we do every monied man in Indiana will become a banker, and we shall have the disastrous shin-plaster system of '19, '20, and '21, enacted over again in Indiana.

It does not follow, sir, that men representing the monied interests of the State will be elected as a matter of course. I undertake to say that men and not money will be represented, and that fifty thousand men in Indiana more competent than either the gentleman or myself to determine the matter, will affirm this principle.

My friend from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) one of the most clear headed members we have, and whom I am always pleased to listen to, for I invariably learn something I esteem valuable whenever he addresses the Convention, has referred to the Parliament of Great Britain, composed of six hundred and fifty-eight members, as a regular body, and yet there cautious legislation prevailed. Now, sir, this body composed of six hundred and fifty-eight members hardly represents three times as many constituent, in point of fact. It represents the land-holders of Great Britain and no one else. It represents the land-holders who own the balance of the community there.

Here Mr. DICK expressed his dissent, and said he thought otherwise.

The gentleman has lived there, and I think this a mistake, not because he knows it to be a mistake, but because his prejudices for the country he has lived in makes him call it a mistake.

I ask him, sir, what representation the interests of the mass of the people receive at the hand of Parliament? It is true they did legislate to protect their own farmers, on the payment of whose rents they were dependent for means—in the passage of the corn laws—and this was caused by sheer necessity, as we had to send them food to keep them from starving, and not from the adoption of a course of policy that they could control. That body, sir, moves cautiously, because its members represent a particular portion of the community on whom they are dependent for place. They look to the land-holders for their seats, and that is the true cause of their cautious legislation.

Sir, a better example I can name, and that is, of the State of New York. With about three millions of inhabitants that State has a Senate composed of thirty-two members, and a House of Representatives composed of one hundred and twenty-eight members. I ask the gentleman from Laporte whether the legislation of the Parliament of Great Britain will compare with the legislation of New York? I undertake to say that the decisions of the court of King's Bench in England are in nowise superior to those delivered in that State during the last fifteen years, excepting, perhaps, two or three years of the last. I say there is no State in the Union—there is no country out of the Union—where there is more cautious and healthy legislation than in the State of New York, during the last fifteen years, coming up say to within about three years. I am not so sure about the last three years, since the people of that State have taken it into their heads to disarrange the old system of jurisprudence, and to abolish all the distinctions between law and equity. I am not satisfied that such a course has proved any advancement in their judicial system. I have my fears upon that score, I confess.

Mr. DOBSON (in his seat). How about free banking?

Mr. KELSO. As to free banking, I have only to ask gentlemen to look over the country and see the experiments that have been made in regard to banking in the different States—first one experiment has been tried and then another. How long is it since we had a United States Bank to hold the deposits of Government? Gen. Jackson, however, concluded to try an experiment with it, and he was certainly a clear-headed politician and a man of some judgment. He took the deposits from the vaults of that bank and put them in the State banks, though greatly as it has since proved to the people's disadvantage and loss. He made a mistake in that, for once.

State banks having failed to answer the purpose, other expedients have been tried, none of which have ever been found to be sound. I consider the State bank system the best we have ever had, although by no means perfect.

I would challenge any gentleman (if this was the appropriate occasion for arguing the question) to show a single instance where State banks have failed so effectually (with the single exception of Illinois) to carry out the purpose designed in their organization, as in the other systems of banking that have been established. They then tried the system of safety-fund banking in New York, but this did not suit them, and they adopted the system of free banks. Finally, sir, they have amalgamated the system of safety-fund and free banking, and that is the system of banking now in use in that State; though I think, sir, that system should be done away with, for I consider it is exercising a control over the commerce of that State detrimental to its best interests. So much for free banking.

But, sir, the question before us is as to representation. How shall we manage that? The bank question will come up at the proper time, and have a day here among us, I have not a doubt. I have already stated my views at length upon this question of representation. I can only say, that if a proposition is presented by way of compromise fixing the number of Senators at thirty-three, and Representatives at one hundred, and giving to the Legislature discretion, as the population of the State increases, to augment that number—not beyond a certain limit, however, say forty Senators and one hundred and twenty Representatives—I will vote for it. I am for any measure that will insure a fair and equal representation in the two branches taken together. But I certainly insist on it that the small counties should have an equal share of representation with the larger counties, in at least one branch of the Legislature.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President: The question before the Convention is one merely of numbers—it is, what shall be the number of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The question as to the basis of representation is not now before us. The evils complained of depends more upon an improper basis than upon what may be the number. The delegate from Owen (Mr. Dobson) says if you reduce the number of Representatives and Senators as proposed in the report from the committee now before you, you will give an undue influence to the large towns and cities, such as Madison, Indianapolis, Terre Haute, &c., and also to the large counties—Wayne, Putnam, Laporte, and some others. Now, sir, I hold that the relative influence of different districts may be affected by the basis of representation, but not by the number of the representative body. If property were made the basis of representation then the wealthy counties would undoubtedly have greatly the advantage; but if population should be, as I have no doubt it will be, made the basis of representation, the number that may constitute the Legislature, whether great or small, can have no injurious effect. Say the present number of the House be reduced (which is one hundred) so long as population shall be the base, the reduction would affect equally the large and small counties, and leave the relative strength of large and small counties the same after a reduction that it was before ; so, if you increase, the population remains the same, so that there can be no advantage whatever to the large counties over the small ones.

Then, sir, if a less number than one hundred Representatives and fifty Senators can discharge the legislative duties of the State, it should be adopted. The State is greatly indebted, and the taxes of the State in a very few years will be full as much as the people can meet. In view of this state of things, sir, I think there should be a due regard to economy. But the gentleman from Laporte thinks the additional expense not worth consideration, it is so very small an amount to each tax payer. It is true the amount to each tax payer may be small, but the aggregate amount will be found large.

I would, as a matter of compromise, be willing to accept the following proposition : The Senate shall consist of twenty-five Senators and the House of Representatives of seventy-five Representatives. The Legislature may, after ten years, increase the number of Representatives to one hundred, and the Senate to not more than one-third the number of the House. This, as a matter of compromise, I should be willing to go for. The question of increase would then be left to the people after ten years, and if at that time an increase should be thought necessary, it can be properly provided for by the Legislature.

MR. NAVE. Yesterday, sir, the Convention attempted to settle this question by silent voting, but it was ascertained that we could not agree upon any proposition. It was found, upon last evening, therefore, that it had become necessary to debate this question ; and in debating it, sir, for one, I am not to be led away from the discharge of the duty which I was sent here to perform, by the cry that the smaller counties are to be overlooked as regards their representation in the Legislature, by the passage of some particular measure, and are to have no voice in the Legislature, or in making the laws of Indiana.

Let us examine this assertion for a moment. The smaller counties have been compared to tar-buckets, left on every stump in the road over which every farmer's cart may pass ; and thus it is said it is with the smaller counties, the large ones over-riding them by having a larger number of representatives in the Legislature. Let us see, sir, whether there can be any greater abuses occur under a reduced representation than has already occurred under the present system of one hundred Representatives and fifty Senators. The Legislature of Indiana has been controled in its action by a few important points in the State for the last ten years. No man can controvert this position. Look at the allowance made to a contractor on the public work at Lafayette—at the claim of McGinley, and the Catholic church at Vincennes. Were not bills passed through the Legislature some years since, allowing these and other exorbitant claims, through the influence of men representing the principal commercial points in Indiana, and that, too, over the head of the Executive who vetoed them ? In view of these facts, sir, I ask whether the interests of the State have been secure under the administration of one hundred Representatives and fifty Senators ?

Sir, this is a representative country. It is a republic based on representation, and the people have, by a delegated power, transferred their sovereignty to a few. The people originally have the sovereignty in their hands, but in this democratic form of government the people have a right to transfer the exercise of that power to a certain number, and to determine the number to whom they shall delegate the power. Is it necessary, I would ask, that the people delegate this power to a greater number than is necessary to carry out their wishes and designs ? I say it is not necessary. Then the question presents itself, does it require one hundred and fifty men, comprising the two branches of the Legislature of Indiana, to carry out the wishes of the people ? I take the ground that the wishes of the people can be carried out by a less number of representatives.

Gentlemen say that the proposed reduction of representatives is a petty picayune proposition. How, sir ? This is a mere proposition to reduce the number of the representatives of the people, involving, of course, in that reduction, a less expenditure of the people's money. I take the ground, sir, that it is the wish of the people that the present number of representatives, in both branches of the Legislature, should be reduced.

Gentlemen tell us that there is no State in the confederacy that has reduced the number of their representatives as low as it is proposed by us now to reduce ours. Look, sir, at the State of New York, with a population of three millions, having only thirty-two senators and one hundred and twenty-eight representatives. Look, too, at Pennsylvania, having a representation that never can exceed seventy in the House, and one-third that number in the Senate. In Ohio, both branches of the Legislature are less than they are in Indiana. When we look, then, at the number of Senators in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, we see that they are less in number than that proposed by the gentleman from Owen in this amendment. I find in the State of New York they have one hundred and twenty-eight representatives, and in the other two States the number of representatives is less than it is proposed to have in Indiana. I ask, Mr. President, in view of this, whether it is necessary that we should have the large number of representatives in the House that it is proposed to have? If it be necessary that we should adopt the largest number that has been proposed, by which each county in the State shall be represented in the House, does it follow, as a matter of course, that we should have fifty senators for the purpose of representing the people in the higher branch of the Legislature? I think not, sir. While upon this subject, I would remark that I have found some very wholesome doctrine with regard to it in a Governor's Message, which I ask leave of the Convention to read. Ex-Governor Wallace, a man of considerable experience, and who has spoken his sentiments to the people of Indiana on this question, when he filled the Gubernatorial chair, the highest office in the gift of the people of Indiana, he, in referring, in a message, to the expenses which had been entailed upon the people of the State, growing out of the fact of misguided and improvident legislation, and of the ability of a small body to do business as legislators more in accordance with the wishes and interests of a free people, and, in the mean time, cheapen the Government of the same, said:

"That it would be in the power of the Legislature to greatly diminish thereafter the expenses of legislation. For, when you come to discharge the constitutional duty which devolves upon you at the present session, (1840,) of fixing the apportionment of senators and representatives for the next five years, a reduction of their number would greatly contribute to curtail the onerous expense of this branch of the Government, without jeopardizing, as I can see, any of the great interests of the State. Indeed, my experience teaches me that a House of Representatives consisting of seventy members, and a Senate of thirty, would transact more business in a less time, far better, and more to the satisfaction of the people, than can a House of a hundred members, and a Senate of fifty."

This was the doctrine of the Governor in 1840. And does not this message contain doctrines that should be considered and acted upon by this Convention, coming, as it does, from a man with the experience of Ex-Governor Wallace, at a time, too, when the State was involved in difficulty and debt, as she is at present. I adhere to this sound doctrine unto this day, and I trust the gentleman, whose opinion I just read, adheres still to the principles he formerly advocated.

Is it possible—I would ask if it is possible, that the people of Indiana are to be involved in a greater debt, when they are groaning already under a heavy taxation, entailed upon them by the mad legislation of the present large number of representatives? Are we to suffer the people of this State to have imposed upon them the unnecessary taxation involved in the largest number of representatives proposed, referred to in the message of the Governor from which I have just read. No, sir. I am for retrenching the expenses of the State in every possible way. The reduction of the number of representatives will, of course, lead to a retrenchment; though aside from this consideration, I am for reducing the number, because the people can be as well represented by a less number of men, as they can by one hundred and fifty men.

It is said that Indianapolis, Madison, Lafayette, and other cities of large commercial interests, will hereafter control the legislation of the State, if the Senate is reduced in number. Now, sir, I do not concur in this view at all. I am not sure, sir, whether the free banking system that has been proposed will be adopted by the people of Indiana; but if it is adopted, I feel bold to say that those points where these banking interests concentrate, will not elect a representative to represent those interests, especially in this State.

Mark what I say, sir—if this system of free banking goes into operation—and these large cities are the points upon which they operate, and through whose representatives they expect to have their designs carried into effect—such representatives will never be elected. The sovereign people of Indiana will control these monopolies. I look upon it as a settled fact, that the farmers of the State will rise up in their might and prostrate everything that will militate against their interests, and take possession of the halls of legislation, and legislate for the true interests of the State, and the State will prosper under their administration.

Mr. WALLACE. The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) has been pleased to refer to a recommendation which I made to the Legislature some years ago, at a time when the financial condition of the State was such as to induce them, if at any time they could be induced, to adopt a system of the most rigid economy. It will be recollected, however, that, notwithstanding the reduction of representation which I then recommended, and notwithstanding the overwhelming pecuniary embarrassments under which the State was then laboring—that recommendation was entirely disregarded.

The representatives of the people then, in despite of these embarrassments, saw fit, in effect, to say what I believe the people themselves will always say—that if there is any one burthen which they will more cheerfully shoulder than another, it is that which compels them to pay for representation. [Applause.] The proof on this point is conclusive; for here is a recommendation to a legislative body having ample power to carry it fully into effect—a recommendation pointing out the very mode by which a large amount of money could be saved to the State—backed by the most powerful inducements to adopt it; yet how was it received and treated? Instead of reducing the Senate to thirty, and the House to sixty members, as recommended, they increased the Senate to fifty, and the House to one hundred—the numbers at which they have stood ever since. What lesson should this teach us? Surely nothing but what I have already asserted—that no matter what may be the pecuniary embarrassments or distresses of the people, they will nevertheless pay for representation cheerfully when they would scarce pay for anything else—that if they determine to economize, they will seek for it in some other departments—or by denying to themselves other advantages which they prize less.

The proposition, therefore, Mr. President, which I shall vote for, and which I hope will carry, is—that the Senate shall not consist of more than fifty members, and the House of not more than one hundred—leaving it to the people through their representatives in the Legislature if they desire it, at any time hereafter, to diminish these numbers. But, Mr. President, my word for it, notwithstanding all the arguments that may be presented in favor of reduction or economy, we will never see the people consent to reduce their Senators or Representatives below the present number of fifty and a hundred. Indeed, sir, judging from my experience of the past; having repeatedly seen these reducing propositions sustained by arguments equally as cogent as we have just heard in this Hall, presented and voted down, and the people acquiescing or approving these votes by re-electing those who gave them, I confess my fears are, that unless we fix a maximum number beyond which they cannot go—they would consent to increase rather than to diminish.

In this Convention, Mr. President, while we are speaking of the occurrences of the past, and of the action of the people's Representatives—it would perhaps be well enough for us to recollect that while charges of immature and injudicious legislation may be preferred by one political party against another, like charges may, with equal propriety, be retorted back upon the accuser. It is not, however, my design now to comment upon any of these charges; but I shall, on some future occasion, if an opportunity is afforded me, speak to them more at large. I shall do so, sir, because I have been repeatedly alluded to in this Hall as one of the great sinners of the by-gone time. I desire to defend not only my own past political conduct and action in regard to certain important measures, but also the conduct and action of some honored friends, who have passed away from these to other, and I hope, happier scenes—I desire to show that even in the midst of errors undesignedly committed we were prompted by laudable desires and the most patriotic motives. In looking back upon the past, I confess I can see many instances wherein I have erred; and of the reference of gentlemen to these blunders I do not complain. It is right that they should do so. It is only by referring to the errors of the past, that we can avoid like errors in the future.

Mr. President, I can only say in conclusion, what I have before stated, that I shall vote to sustain the proposition limiting the Senate to fifty, and the House to one hundred members—giving to the people the power to diminish that number whenever they shall deem it necessary; and be assured, sir, whenever they shall so determine, their Representatives will come up here and faithfully reflect their will and pleasure on the subject. Let us, then, leave the reduction of representation to the decision of the people.

Mr. BARBOUR. I believe, Mr. President, that if we reduce the number of representatives to twenty-five in the Senate and seventy-five in the House it will be regarded by the people as one of the best reforms we have made. In the county of Vigo, sir, there are over three thousand voters, and I do not believe you will get fifty votes out of that number for a continuance of the present system of representation, viz.: fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives. I should like much to know the opinion of other delegates as to the wishes of the people on this subject. I am satisfied, sir, if this question were to be submitted directly to the people that there would be a large majority of them in favor of reduction. This question has long been agitated among the people, but no Legislature has as yet been elected with the special view of arranging it; but this body has been elected with a view to the settlement of this as of other important questions. The Legislature is a body that will never reduce representation; that reduction has to be made by a body of individuals who are not anxious to secure place here in future.

I heartily concur with the sentiment of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) that the great interests of this State will be as faithfully attended to by twenty-five Senators and seventy-five Representatives as by a larger number. I ask those gentlemen who desire the largest number of representation to show us what particular interest of the State will be neglected if we have a smaller number of Representatives? I would ask gentlemen to show us if they can in what respect twenty-five Senators and seventy-five Representatives are not as competent to pass wise and wholesome laws and to represent the whole interests of the people of the State as fifty Senators and one hundred Representatives? Will there be any preference in legislation because one representative may live at the distance of ten miles from us instead of five miles? is that going to prevent him from legislating for the great interests of Indiana? I trust not, sir. I think not. I believe he will be as competent and as ready to faithfully perform his duty as if we were his next door neighbors.

It should be recollected by the Convention that we are about to dispense, in a great measure, with special and local legislation, and when this is disposed of what will the Legislature have to do? They will have only to pass wise and wholesome laws for the protection of persons and property, and in the execution of those duties they will have the wisdom of every member of the body to assist in perfecting the law. Heretofore bad laws of a special or local character have been passed in this way. They have been introduced by one or two members, and out of courtesy, in many instances, to those members they have been adopted. But now when they are only to pass laws of a general character, which are to operate alike on every citizen of the State, the aggregate wisdom of the Legislature will be brought to bear on every measure presented, so that the laws will be matured in judgment, and we shall have in the end wise and wholesome laws. For my part, sir, I can see no interest that will be neglected because of a reduction in representation.

Let us take the proposition of the gentleman from Putnam, sir, providing for twenty-five Senators and seventy-five Representatives, and then, as he has said, at the end of ten years let the Legislature be elected with a direct reference to the opinion of the people upon the question of an increase or reduction of representation. We may insert in the Constitution an amendment providing that the question may be submitted to the people at the end of ten years, whether they do or do not desire to have the number of their Representatives augmented; and in accordance with their wishes the number of representatives can remain as they now stand or be increased or reduced.

I think I hazard nothing in saying that when the question of reduction or no reduction of the number of the legislative body is submitted to the people, they will give a vote in favor of reduction not to be misunderstood.

Sir, the State of New York has been referred to in the course of this debate. Now that State has only thirty-two Senators, and I recently conversed with an intelligent gentleman living in that State, remote from her large city, and asked him if the people of that State had experienced any inconvenience from the limited number of their Senators. He expressed himself in the negative; and yet, sir, in that State there are more large and flourishing cities than in any other State in the Union. I deny the assertion of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) implicitly if not avowedly made that the commercial interests of the large cities and towns were antagonistical to the local interests of those living away from those points in the country. There may be sometimes a little prejudice between country and town, but it amounts to nothing; their real interests are closely identified. If the country flourishes the towns and cities flourish. The growth of one is the necessary growth of the other; and if the town has any great influence it is in consequence of her votes—her population—and to that extent she ought to have influence in a government of equals.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I represent one of the small counties of the State, Mr. President, perhaps it will not be out of place for me to make few remarks upon this question.

Who is it, sir, that calls for a reduction of the Legislature? I desire to inquire into that. Is it not your large and populous counties that are calling for a reduction? With the exception of perhaps one or two counties, there is no disposition to increase the number of the Legislature.

It was observed by the gentleman from DeCATUR, (Mr. Robinson,) who is in favor of a reduction of representation, that we should take into consideration two things: representation and taxation—that they should go together. Now, sir, perhaps in these large and populous counties the tax may trouble them, but I have only to say that these small counties would be willing to share the tax with them—or at least the county I represent would be willing I think—if we can be represented. Gentlemen say that they do not care what the expense of holding this Convention is, provided we make a good Constitution—they want to make a good Constitution for the people, but at the same time when the subject of representation is brought up they are for retrenchment and reform. Economy is the great cry. I am willing, sir, to compromise. Just let these gentlemen who hail from the large counties, come forward half-way and we who come from the small counties will meet them. If they have more tax to pay for representation than they desire to pay, we are willing to pay a fair share of it, provided, we can be represented. The effect, sir, in my opinion, of reducing the representation, will be to strengthen the strong, and weaken the weak, entirely changing the relative positions the smaller counties have occupied hitherto in regard to the larger. When the election comes on, the stronger counties will invariably rule. I consider if this rule is carried out, the small county can only be looked upon as a kind of dependency—a tenant at will. We cannot say that the small counties are independent, because they have very little influence. The only privilege afforded them is that of choosing between the candidates put forth in the larger counties.

It is a common saying, sir, that no man can serve two masters; and this rule I consider true as applied to the representation of the two counties. For instance, my colleague (Mr. Read) represents the counties of Monroe and Brown; now can he serve both counties if they happen to get at variance? Suppose an opposition—a diversity of interest springs up between the two counties, can my colleague; for whom I entertain the highest respect, represent the interest of both counties upon a question the result of that division of feeling in which they are antagonistic in position to each other, when he has but one vote? He will most probably vote for the interest of the county in which he resides. Consequently, it is evident that when the weaker county has an interest at variance with the stronger county, they have no voice at all in the Legislature. As I remarked before, I have a very high respect for my colleague; but I must be allowed to defend the interests of my own county, especially when a subject like that of representation, in which it is so deeply interested, comes up for consideration. The present number of members in the Legislature, sir, were elected just as we were. That body has had opportunity hitherto, if the people had desired it, of reducing their number, yet they have not thought of changing it. When the population was not near so large as it now is, they preferred fixing the number of Representatives at one hundred and Senators at fifty. It seems to me, sir, a strange kind of reasoning that when the population is small its number of representatives should be greater than when it has nearly double its former population.

In my opinion, sir, there is not a provision proposed to be inserted in the new Constitution that will so dispose my county, and I think the other small counties of the State, to vote against the adoption of the new Constitution, as to provide therein that they shall be deprived of the right of making the laws by which they are governed. In my county the number of voters is seven hundred and seventy-four—say eight hundred—and if we adopt biennial sessions in the new Constitution, I think we will be entitled to one representative independently, every seven years, or one seventh part of our interests will be represented every year. Now, sir, if we could have a representative ever year or two, from our county and not be entirely disfranchised, we would much prefer it.

The gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) alluded to local interests, and said that by reducing the number of representatives so that they would represent one or more counties, that any local or one-sided representation of these interests would be destroyed. I understand that local laws apply to a few counties and general laws apply to all the counties. Now by having a representative for each county we can have a general representation; these local feelings, common to all counties, can be represented. There is another important fact: A person living in the county of Wayne has the opportunity of voting for four different men for representatives, but an individual living in Brown county can only vote for one representative. This I think should be equalized. If there are large counties electing three or four representatives, let them be distributed into townships or districts for representative purposes.

Reference was made to the Legislature, about their members being improperly influenced in their votes and actions. I would ask if there is not less danger of one hundred and fifty men being bribed, than of one hundred men, allowing that that body is ruled by any improper influences, which I earnestly hope it is not. I ask, sir, if in representation we ought not to approximate to the people as nearly as may be, and this can be done by increasing the number of our representatives.

Mr. President, in the course of debate we often digress from one thing to another, and therefore I trust I will be pardoned if I, for a few moments, follow the example that has been set me.

Gentlemen have arisen in this Convention and made Union speeches, opposed a dismemberment of the Union, and said they knew nothing but the Union. Now, sir, this is the language of my county—it knows nothing but the Union. They have always been for the Union; they are now for the Union; they always will be for the Union. Allusion has been made to the wealth and numerical superiority of different counties, as if they were to be a criterion of attachment to the Union. In 1846 my county numbered four or five hundred able bodied men, able to bear arms, and we sent to Mexico one fourth of that number. I think patriotism and service in the battles of our country ought to be taken into consideration as much as wealth and money. I consider that by our works we evidence our attachment to the Union; and in addition to what I have stated in regard to the number of men that served in the Mexican war from our county, I would remark that a lady residing there has evidenced her love for the prosperity of the Union by presenting her husband, at one birth, with three fine strapping boys. [Laughter and applause.]

MR. READ of Monroe. MR. PRESIDENT, as some allusion has been made by my respected colleague (Mr. Chandler) to my own position on this question, I may be permitted to offer a word of explanation. I by no means complain of the allusion which he has made.

I have already stated on this floor, that for the very purpose of meeting the wishes and interest of the smaller counties, (and of this class is one of the counties which I represent,) I shall vote for one hundred as the number to compose the House of Representatives. This whole subject must be a matter of consultation and compromise. No single individual or county can carry such a subject.

I am satisfied that in a considerable number of counties a reduction of representation is desired. This I believe to be the universal sentiment in Monroe county, (which I also represent,) a county of about medium population.

Well, sir, let the House remain stationary, and let the Senate be reduced. This is the ground upon which we may all meet, and where all our views may be best harmonized.

Allusion has this morning been made to the danger of corporation and bank influence controlling or swaying a Senate composed of thirty or thirty-five members. It is, I believe a principle of human action, that where the number of actors is increased responsibility is divided. It may be so divided as to be scarcely felt. This is a danger in all numerous representative bodies.

With a small Senate, we have the principle of a high degree of direct personal responsibility. With a sufficiently numerous House, we have the representation of all the interests of the State. With the two combined we have the elements of safe and wise legislation.

If we look at the past history of our State, we shall find no remarkable capacity in a Legislature composed of even a hundred and fifty men, to resist the bank influence, which the gentleman from Owen thinks so necessary to guard against. When has the State Bank asked privileges of the Legislature which it has not obtained? Was it, when contrary to all sound principle of political economy, it asked the power to issue bills of a denomination less than five dollars? Was it when, as a special privilege to itself alone, it demanded a suspension of the stay laws for the collection of bank debts; laws, the policy of which I shall not discuss, but which were designed to protect the property of debtors at a period of great pecuniary distress. Why, sir, the various acts granting powers and privileges, asked by the bank, make a considerable book. I am not sure but a smaller body, in which a higher sense of responsibility would have rested upon each member, would have presented a more effective check to its demands.

But, sir, I am ready, at once, as I have before stated on this floor, to vote for a House of one hundred members, (and in this I understood that I was coming up to the full wishes of my colleague) if the question can be so divided as to enable me to give my vote in that way. This is one of the very subjects upon which of all others, there must be concession and compromise, and such I may claim, has been the spirit which I have manifested in the matter from first to last, and which I shall continue to manifest to its final adjustment.

Mr. WOLFE. I am in favor of a reduction in both branches of the Legislature, although I do not represent one of those large counties that have been so frequently alluded to. In looking over the list before me, I see that there are fifty-two counties that have over two thousand polls, and thirty-eight counties having under two thousand polls—and my county stands in the list of thirty-eight. Yet, sir, I am for a reduction in both branches of the Legislature, and when I say that I believe that I am representing the wishes of my people.

I believe, sir, if we adopt a proposition providing, say for thirty senators and seventy-five or eighty Representatives, that it will meet with the hearty concurrence of the people. I am satisfied and I believe that every gentleman in this Convention must be satisfied that a smaller number in both branches of the Legislature than there is at present, will certainly expedite the business of that body. It will, of course, be of less expense. Gentlemen may say what they please in reference to dollars and cents—but I tell them that they come here for no other purpose than to introduce economy in the different departments of government. It cannot be disputed, sir, that the people would never have authorized the calling of this Convention, except on the score of economy. This Convention would not have been sitting here now, if it had not been supposed that it would seek to introduce a general system of economy in the administration of government as far as practicable. Let us carry out economy and then we will fulfil the wishes of the people and execute what they have sent us here to perform. Say that we do not get a representation but once in one or two years we shall not suffer from it, because if our laws are made general, as anticipated, and if those individuals who live in Marion, Wayne, Jefferson, and other large counties, can live under them, those of us who live in smaller counties can do so likewise. If the majority pass a law binding the minority, the minority will have rights and privileges under the same law. The majority cannot put a rule upon the minority that they themselves must not submit to. Then there is no hardship in this matter, as I can see.

Now, sir, I would have been willing, myself, if I thought it would not have had the effect of causing the people to reject the new Constitution, to have inserted a provision in it, providing that each county should have a representative. But I am satisfied, sir, that such a provision would endanger the Constitution. I know one thing, sir, that so far as combinations for the purpose of effecting certain objects are concerned, that having a representative from each county would have a great tendency to destroy them. I have seen in this Hall, sir, under the present system of representation, that there have been combinations made by the delegates from the large and popular counties that have proved very injurious to the people. Now that we are going into a system of only making general laws, I have not so much fear for the future that such combination will again be made. Let us then, proceed, and make a reduction in the representation.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have listened with great patience to the debate which this subject has created, and, until the present moment, had not thought it my duty to participate in it. I shall, however, occupy the attention of the Convention a very few moments in briefly stating a few suggestions which have occurred to my mind during this discussion.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that the object of this Convention should be to fix upon such a number of Representatives in both branches of the Legislature, as will meet with the wants as well as the wishes of our constituents; then we should leave it to the Legislature, as it is most particularly within their province to make such provisions for districting and apportioning this standard number among the different counties of the State, as in their wisdom they may deem from time to time necessary.

I have been somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) who hitherto has been a most unflinching opponent to all banks, and of all corporations that are created by the Legislature, to find him now an ardent supporter of a proposition which will provide for such a small number of senators, as would place that body perfectly in the power of the corporations of the State. I am not astonished that other gentlemen, who have not such a vehement hatred toward these corporations, should express themselves in favor of a reduction in the number of senators. But when I see a gentleman, who, in all his acts and speeches, on all occasions, professed himself their most inveterate antagonist, I confess I am at a loss to see why he is so strong an advocate for a reduction of the Senate to thirty members.

I ask gentlemen to remember the action of the State of Pennsylvania upon the subject of a United States Bank. Do they not recollect in the session of 1833-4, that, through the influence of the mammoth Bank of the United States, they took charge of the reins of government, and ruled its counsels so as to enable them to procure a re-charter in that State. This would not have been the case, sir, if that State had been represented as it should have been, by a number large enough to resist corrupting out-door influence. With a sufficient number of Representatives in that State, the supporters of that bank could not have overruled her State counsels, or by improper influences have obtained a majority in favor of its re-charter. It is a notorious fact, that bribery and corruption were the instruments of this bank to influence the will of the Legislature in the furtherance of their designs. The importunities of the friends of this corporation, and the overtures of assistance indirectly made, resulted in securing a re-charter of that institution. I take it upon me to say, sir, that if this Convention fixes the number of our senators at thirty, that it will be in the power of the corporations of this State to influence their action. For one, sir, I do not desire to have a Senate so small in number that it can be controlled by political wire-workers, or any of those influences that continually prevail around the capital. Gentlemen may talk as they please, but if the number of senators is fixed at thirty, the out-door influence of friends, and the practice of log-rolling, will exert such a corrupting influence over their action, that it will subvert the end for which that body is created. It is a well-known fact, that the action of small bodies in regard to politics, religion, or any other subject with which men have anything to do, are often improperly influenced. The advocates of corporations, the agents of capitalists, will be here to cajole, to interest, or to influence members into favorable action in behalf of the corporations of the State. Many honest and well-meaning members who would oppose improper and corrupt overtures would be lead to assist in that action by false statements and sophistical reasoning.

I hope, sir, that the proposition of the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) will be adopted. The number he proposes, fifty in the Senate, and one hundred in the House, is small enough, for it is not probable that one hundred and fifty men will be so liable to be improperly influenced as a body composed of only two-thirds of that number.

There is something due, also, to the smaller counties of the State. I live in a large county, one that will compare with any other county in the State, in point of agriculture, commerce, and wealth. It lies on the borders of the great lakes of the North, having every facility afforded for trade and commercial pursuits. Then, too, it is one of those prairie counties where farmers accumulate wealth with less labor than the farmers of any other county of the State, and our tax book will show that that wealth is not inconsiderable. I have no fears, sir, but that we shall always be entitled to one representative, and have a part in making the laws under which we live. But, sir, there are counties inferior in size, wealth, and population, which have as much right to a representative in the Legislature to defend their interests, as we have. And it should be our duty while we provide for a representative of the interests of the larger counties of the State to see that the smaller and weaker counties are also properly represented. As this is the just and fair ground upon which we should act, I do not think this point needs further consideration at my hands.

But, sir, to revert again to the influence which corporations will exert upon a reduced representation. Do you suppose, sir, if the State Bank and her branches desire to have any privilege conferred upon them, will not come here and endeavor to carry out their designs? Certainly they will. And if you place only fifteen or sixteen men in the control of the action of the Senate these corporations will inevitably control and influence them through all time to come. But, sir, if you fix the Senate at fifty members, and the House at one hundred, much less damage need be apprehended influencing so large a number of men to the promotion of their designs. I grant you, sir, that these corporations will come here with fair promises, and apparently honest propositions. They will not ask you to do what they think is wrong, but they will tell you it is for the best interest of the State that their measures should be adopted, and it may be that in some instances it would be to the interest of the State; nevertheless we should guard against all improper intervention. Men are selfish, and they are governed by self-interest, and as far as they can, in every practicable way, they will seek to advance those interests. Therefore it is that men will come here and work zealously, and apparently honestly, in forwarding the interest of these corporations.

Sir, I cannot but think that when we attempt to reduce our representation, we retrograde in political science. I have thrown out these remarks merely for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen to the fact that if both branches of the Legislature, and particularly the Senate, are reduced in number, that they are much more liable to be governed by improper extraneous influences, than if the present number was sustained.

Pending the question, on motion of Mr. SHERROD,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The delegate from Shelby, Mr. JAMES ELIOT, vice Mr. J. VANBENTHUYSEN, deceased, took the oath and his seat.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the amendment offered by Mr. DOBSON.

Mr. MRSCOM said that this was a question in which he felt deeply interested, and he desired to make one or two remarks before the vote was taken. The gentleman from Hendricks had referred to the States of New York and Ohio, to show that legislation was done in these States by comparatively small bodies of men, notwithstanding that in both of these States the population and the number of voters were vastly more numerous—especially in the State of New York, than it was ever likely to be in the State of Indiana. If gentlemen would look to the State of Ohio, where they had only seventy-two representatives, and thirty-six senators, they would find that instead of doing their business in six weeks or two months as was usually the case in Indiana, they sat from three to four months in the year. Now take seventy-two men, and let them sit from three to four months, and take a hundred men and let them sit for six weeks or two months, and what would be gained? What saving would be effected? If they examined into the matter they would find that the great State of New York had sessions that last generally about four months in the year. The argument, therefore, that a small body of men would despatch business more speedily than a large one did not hold good so far as the experience of other States went, for there was no State in the Union with a body of men so small as that in the Legislature of Indiana, in which the business was executed with so much dispatch. Look at the Senate of the United States, and compare that body with the House of Representatives. What did experience teach there? Had they not during the last session of Congress spent nine whole months in debating one question? Where was the dispatch there? True they were a very dignified body, and could not be muzzled by the previous question. That was a rule fit only to be applied to the dolts of the Lower House. As has been remarked by one gentleman on that floor, whether the Senate was reduced in numbers or not, there would be no harm in reducing them in dignity; for he did not believe in this thing of a small body of men sitting in one end of the Capitol as a board of censors over the larger body at the other end. He had no notion of such an aristocracy sitting there as lords over the people. He contended that it was just as necessary to have a large body in the Senate as it was in the Lower House. There was no good reason that he was aware of why the Senate should be so small a body as some gentlemen proposed they should be. If there was any use in having a Senate at all why not have it a large body? The responsibility was the same; they had to pass the same laws that were passed in the other branch of the Legislature, and why set up these few men to control, and in many cases to render nugatory, the action of the larger body? He could not agree with the gentleman who had said that it was necessary to have a small body of men sitting in the other end of the Capitol to act with a kind of supervisory care over the House of Representatives. He did not believe that the people sent any man to that House over whom they thought it was necessary that the Senate should exercise a supervisory care.

Again, it was said that the Convention would abolish local legislation, and that there would not be that necessity for a large number of men that there was when the legislation was so much of a local character. Now, he took directly the opposite ground; for if legislation was to be general, he contended that such laws as were passed, required to be well digested; that the whole subjects involved in them should undergo a thorough and searching examination, and the operations of such laws be viewed in all their bearings, because every gentleman on that floor would admit that different sections of the State had different interests; and if there was a diversity of interests, it was necessary that the voice of the people should be heard from each section, so that these general laws should not bear more heavily on one section than on another. He thought it was as necessary, and perhaps even more necessary to have a large body to pass general, than it was to pass local laws; for, when local laws were passed, they affected but a county or a town; but when general laws were passed, they affected the whole State. He conceived, then, that there was no reason whatever, in the argument that it was only necessary to have a small body to pass general laws. He thought that, in such an assertion, gentlemen could not be sincere, and he doubted much whether they would dare to attempt to carry out their proposition before the people. He did not argue thus because he came from a small county. On the contrary, his county was as large as any, and there was no danger that it would ever be without a representation, but because all experience showed that small bodies did not do business with near so much dispatch as large ones.

Again, it was said that one man could represent two counties as well as one. He did not believe this, for it would not unfrequently happen that a local question would arise, in which the interest of one county was directly the reverse of that of the other county, and a man representing two counties, in such case, could not vote so as to suit the interests of both; and he would naturally vote in favor of the interests of the county in which he resided. This rendered it more necessary that there should be one representative at least from every county.

MR. ALLEN. MR. PRESIDENT: I do not expect to detain the Convention but a few moments, nor would I say one word, but I think that it is due to myself, to place myself right before my constituents. My people are as much in favor of reform and economy, as any portion of this State; but, sir, if this amendment should be adopted, it will certainly take from one and perhaps from both of the counties, which I have the honor to represent, their representative in the popular branch of the Legislature. This, I am sure, they would not consent to under any circumstances. Each of the counties which I represent, is, under the present apportionment and number of representatives, entitled to one Representative in the lower branch of the Legislature; and if, by the action of this body, in the formation of the new Constitution, they should be deprived of that number of Representatives, I am sure that they would vote against the adoption of the new Constitution; and it would, to that extent, at least, endanger its adoption. I am, therefore, unwilling that the number of Representatives, in the popular branch of the Legislature, should be reduced below one hundred. As it regards the Senate, I am not so tenacious; still I believe that fifty is none too many. I believe in a full representation, for the fewer Representatives you have in the Legislature, the nearer you approximate to the one man power; so the greater the number in the Legislature, the nearer you approach a democracy. I am not contending that there cannot be too great a number; there is, as I contend, a proper medium; and that is when all the different interests in the different departments of life are fully represented. It is idle to talk about one man representing a large district, where the interests of different portions of the same district are diverse and conflicting, which must necessarily be the case in many instances, when you reduce the number of Representatives in either house, and thereby enlarge the bounds of the districts. There is another difficulty arising from large districts, where county boundaries are observed. In some districts, there will be a large access of population, while others will fall far below the ratio; which tends to make representation unequal, and create dissatisfaction and discord. By making the representation more full, this difficulty is, to some extent, obviated, and representation more equal. There is another consideration which, it seems to me, should exert a great influence on this question, and that is the great increase of population which may be justly anticipated during the existence of the Constitution which we are about framing.

Sir, if we wish to keep the legislative branch of our government pure—if we expect to protect and foster all the great and growing interests of our State in all time to come, we must secure to all the different interests and departments of life, a full, equal, and faithful representation in the Legislative department of our State government. It is said by gentlemen that the Senate is intended to operate as a check upon the popular branch of the Legislature. But, sir, I can see no reason why a smaller body should be a greater check upon the popular branch of the Legislature, than a larger one—it seems to me that the reverse is true—that a smaller body would be much easier influenced than a larger one. Sir, is it not just as necessary that the people should be represented in the Senate, as in the Lower House? Should it not be so arranged that at least a portion of the Senate should come fresh from the people every year; thereby reflecting in that body, to some extent, the immediate will of the people? I am in favor of bringing representation as near home to the people as possible. Sir, suppose you reduce the Senate to the number of thirty, as is contemplated by the amendment, do you not give too great an importance to the office of Senator?—do you not place in the hands of sixteen men, which would be a majority, too much power? Is not this too small a number to control the legislation, and settle those important questions of interest, which will necessarily arise in this already great and growing State? Entertaining these views, I shall, of course, go against the amendment, and hope that it will not be adopted by the Convention.

MR. BADGER moved to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Owen, on the table; and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken on the motion, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—64.

So the amendment to the amendment was not laid upon the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) to the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax). The original amendment is, that the Senate shall consist of thirty members and the House of Representative of one hundred. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment, the following was the result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Dobson, Edmonston, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Elliott, Wallace, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

So the amendment to the amendment was not adopted.

MR. DAVIS of Madison. Mr. President, I have reason to believe that several gentlemen voted under a misapprehension. I therefore move that the vote last taken be re-considered.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the motion to re-consider, and were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, Mather, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

So the motion to re-consider the vote was agreed to.

MR. HOVEY. I believe that the provision of the old Constitution in regard to this matter is better than any amendment that has yet been offered. The old Constitution provides that the Senate shall consist of not more than one-half nor less than one-third of the number of the House of Representatives; and that that House shall consist of not less than thirty-six nor more than one hundred members. Now, if we change this and adopt a new rule, the smaller counties or the larger ones will certainly object, and the Constitution which we may frame will be in great danger of being rejected by the people in consequence of such action. If we reduce the number the small counties will object; and if you increase the number the large counties will say, "you are putting upon us an unnecessary burden of expense." But let it remain as it is, agreeably to the old Constitution, and I believe that the people will be satisfied. I have drawn up an amendment which I will offer in its proper place. It is as follows:

"The Senate shall consist of not less than one-third nor more than one-half of the number of the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives shall consist of not less than thirty-six nor more than one hundred members, to be chosen by the qualified electors of their respective counties, or of the districts into which the State may from time to time be divided."

I hope that the amendment now before the Convention will be voted down, and the provisions of the old Constitution be adopted. The General Assembly can then reduce the number of Senators or Representatives to suit the tastes of the people, whenever they may demand it.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. The identical question involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, is pending in the motion of the gentleman from Jennings to strike out the whole section.

Mr. HOVEY. No, sir. The motion of the gentleman from Jennings is merely to strike out the section. He offers nothing as a substitute.

Loud cries of "question," "question."

Mr. WOLFE. Would it be in order now to say a few words?

Cries of "no, no," and "question, question, question," and "hear him, hear him."

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Dobson, and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bow-ers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Elliott, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, Mather, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on adopting the amendment as amended, which is, that the Senate shall consist of fifty members and the House of Representatives of one hundred.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "No, no, no," and "vote, vote."

Mr. MILLER. Then I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. KELSO. And I renew it. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, and there were yeas 62, nays 69—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, March, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bow-ers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Zenor—69.

So the motion to lay the amendment on the table was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the section by inserting before the words "fifty" and "one hundred," the words "not to exceed."
